A CHANCE FOR NEBRASKA

The defeat of Syracuse by Indiana last Saturday shows that even the eastern champions are not invincible. It indicates that the Orange eleven has a weakness which, if the Cornhuskers can locate and overcome it, may mean victory for Nebraska.

The fall of the easterners on the first lap of their western journey, however, is dangerous to Nebraska's chances. Humbled in their first game, they are coming to Lincoln all the more determined to win. The sting of one defeat will take away the acute attack of overconfidence for which the team paid the penalty at Indiana.

Taking it all in all, the situation relative to the Thanksgiving game should give the Cornhuskers an even break. It ought to give Nebraska confidence, but not overconfidence. It means that the Orange will have to play the type of football which won the eastern championship in order to triumph over the west.

KEEPING ONE'S EQUILIBRIUM

One of the marks of true greatness and real worth of an individual is the manner in which he receives honors which are thrust upon him by his associates. Many men and women who happen to receive some unusual honor or signal mark of attention from their associates lose their poise and begin to attribute qualities to themselves which make them think that they are really better than they are. They affect an air of superciliousness and snobbishness towards those of their former acquaintance because of this fancied superiority of theirs. This is especially true on a college campus. Hardly a generation of students passes but what this same kind of thing is repeated in scores of instances. Students have honors thrust upon them or succeed to a particular class office, then suddenly become inflated with a sense of their own worth to the community. Many men, who in the first year or two of their college career were thought of as good fellows by their classmates, lose the esteem of their fellows because of this reason.

The same thing is true in the case of certain women, who because of certain little traits in their personality become to receive more attention here at college than they were accustomed to in their own home town, no longer accord the same little courtesies and consideration to other folks as they were wont to do before they attained their popularity.

Then some day comes the bitter awakening to the truth that they are not what they have seemed to themselves but mere humans and of a very mediocre type at that. Many individuals never come to realize such a thing which is to their misfortune.

After all the individual who really counts is the one who does not allow the events of the passing moment to turn his head and to overestimate his worth.—Purdue Exponent.

BUILDING FROM THE TOP DOWN

One of the chief criticisms with the American educational systems is that they have been built from the top down instead of from the bottom up. The purely scholastic mind has been the goal rather than the practical mind so developed as to meet the ordinary problems of everyday life. In the past the grade school curriculums have been arranged primarily to fit the pupil for the secondary or high school and the high school work has been mere preparation for college work. Too frequently the young man or woman graduated from college with high honors is actually fitted for nothing except to teach that which is directly connected with the individual's educational experiences.

It is only in recent years that any progress has been made in fitting the student to meet the practical problems of life. Even so there is much for improvement in this matter and it is only fair to the teachers and professors to say that the blame lies largely with the parents and children. The idea of sending a young man to high school or college to make him a good workman, and subsequently, a better citizen, is seldom foremost in the parent's mind. America's colleges, broadly speaking, are filled with young men whose fathers were denied the opportunities of such an education and these fathers, hoping to give their sons advantages which they as young men did not have, unwittingly sent these sons off to college to learn how to be dandies, or at the best, masters of certain branches of human knowledge which are removed from everyday experiences by a chasm so broad that the average young man finds his education virtually useless.

This is not to disparage the study of science, philosophy, art and the other necessary subjects with which one must acquaint himself in order to receive a college diploma. But a whole chest of tools will not help a man build a house if he does not know how to use the tools, and unless a young man or woman knows how to use the knowledge obtained in the solution of practical problems, the education has no more value than any other luxury.—Lincoln Star.
