STAND BY THE TEAM.

The Nebraska Cornhuskers have already lost two basketball games in the race for the Missouri Valley title and it seems apparent that they will not finish the season at the top of the list. We have become so accustomed to seeing Nebraska teams win championships in every branch of sports that we hardly know how to act when we have a losing team. Whenever a team drops a game or two there are a number of individuals who immediately begin to crab the players, the coach, and the referee. They have the idea that we must win all of the time.

Nebraska rooters are full of the old spirit when the team is winning. The Pittsburgh gridiron victory proved that. As a matter of fact it doesn't take a very loyal student to cheer when his team is outscoring the opponents. But Nebraska athletic fans are now faced with the duty of supporting a team that evidently is in for a number of lickings before the close of the season. We must remember that it takes a good loser to be a good winner. We have a good team and they are working hard. They deserve our support to the last man. Let's thunder out old "U-U-U-n-i" just as though we had the best team in the nation.

FALSE MODESTY.

The Columbia Spectator comes out with an editorial under a caption identical with the above, lamenting the idea that winners of the various athletic letters are ashamed to wear the insipidia on their sweaters because of the fact that their fellow students will regard it as an affectation. This certainly is false modesty in its most malignant form. It is difficult to believe that such a situation can possibly exist, even at Columbia. When such a state of affairs as this exist, these is something radically wrong with the spirit of the institution. Either the athletes do not consider it an honor to wear the emblem of their alma mater or the student body does not realize the significance of awarding a man his letter.

It is not necessary to discuss conditions at Nebraska in this connection. The Cornhusker wears his "N" with righteous pride and the student body regard it as his right and duty to do so. The question of modesty, false or otherwise, does not enter into the situation at all. There are, of course, certain regulations regarding the wearing of letters which are rigidly observed at all times.

It is certainly that such an outstanding and highly reputed institution as Columbia finds itself in this dilemma. A school, just as a city, state, or nation, must have its heroes and there must be an established uniform system of recognition for their services. In most cases this is the awarding of a letter. An athletic letter is merely a service stripe, indicating that the wearer has given time and labor to the service of his school. We truly regret the Columbia situation but rejoice that Nebraska does not and is not likely to face a similar problem.

The quibbling over the contested seats in the legislature now convening reminds us of the old gag of sell-chapel seats to freshmen.

We have heard comments over the campus that the 1922 gridiron schedule is not strong enough for the team we expect to have next fall. We can't see it this way. The chart includes five Valley games—enough to give us absolute supremacy. It includes the strongest 1922 team in the middle west—Notre Dame. It also includes a team with a very high rating on the eastern coast, Syracuse. What more do you want?

Contemporary Opinion

TALKING SHOP.

"Say, don't you fellows ever get through talking shop?"

This admonition, in highly bored, indignatna tones, is often heard from some exasperated person whose sensibilities are riled when people carry their work outside the office.

But draw yourself a mental cartoon. The gentleman who usually makes this remark is never one of the intellectual heavyweights of the company, is he? He never carries his work outside the office. Chances are, he couldn't. It's the men who have the business at heart, who feel the responsibility, who see the need for talking shop sometimes, that outrage the ears of listeners who would trifle through the leisure hours.

Talking shop is one of the little tricks that makes the world go round. It stirs up new ideas, new inventions, new organizations. It does away with formality, and just discusses business the way it stacks up to the average worker. It thinks about the human side of work.

You can talk shop in college as well as business. You can discuss the subjects you study in class at the dinner table, around the fireside. You can mull over activities on the street car going downtown. You'll find that it clarifies the subjects and the activities when you get down to working at them in the class or the office again.—Ohio State Lantern.
