PUTTING A PRICE ON PLEASURE

Is it not strange that pleasures always seem twice as enjoyable if they are earned? They say that the who would dance must pay the fiddler, but if the fiddler is given his compensation in advance, the pleasure always seems more perfect for it is bought and paid for. "If I get this lesson I may go to the show tonight" says the student to his conscience. The lesson got he enjoys the evening twice as much as if he had said, "I'll go whether I get it or not".

The one who says the latter is the one who is going to strike a snag. Somehow or other pleasures must always be paid for, and if provision is made for it ahead of time, it will never create a debt that will draw interest until it is made good. It is this unpaid interest that swallows up a large part of the principle and makes school "hard sledding" for those who have a tendency to seek pleasure and charge it on account.

The account is payable in full at every exam period. Then it is impossible to secure credit, and sometimes failures result if the indulgence in unearned pleasures has been too riotous.

ADVERTISE NEBRASKA

In one more week, some four thousand students of the University of Nebraska will start their trips home for the spring vacation. For one week they will forget studies and will enjoy themselves with their families, sleeping late and eating much, strolling and riding through the surrounding country, and enjoying themselves in general. Hardly a student will think of the university during that week of pleasure.

But whether they think of the university or not they are by their very personality, by their very actions, by the things they do while at home, advertising the university to the people of their community, either favorably or unfavorably. If they go home and raise a big rumpus over nothing just for what they believe is "sport" if they go home and "highbrow" all of their old associates, if they go home and do things which they know very well they should not do, they are advertising the university in the most injurious way.

On the other hand, if they go home and talk University of Nebraska to all of their high school friends, to those young people who have finished high school and might consider continuing higher education, to the taxpayers of the community and the people in general, they will do what they rightfully should do. If they tell the people all of the good points of the student body and tell them the actual facts in regard to scandal stories—most of which are absurdly exaggerated when they are sent into the state, tell them of the needs of the University an actually show the people that they are glad of the opportunity to attend Nebraska, they will be doing what they honestly should do to make a bigger and better Nebraska.

Let every student go home next week and show the people there that the school has NOT given them the "bighead" that they are as interested as ever in the welfare of their home town, that they would like to see every boy and girl in the town have the chance of attending Nebraska and would like to see the people get behind the University and give it the many things which it needs and must have. Advertise the university as it really is and sell it to the people in all parts of the state.

Contemporary Opinion

FIRST IMPRESSIONS

First impressions count the most and last the longest. Many a student has discovered this fact to his great grief at the end of the semester. He enters the class late in the confusion of the registration period, using it as a means to disguise his natural indolence. He doesn't crack a book for weeks, and meantime takes a generous portion of cuts. The instructor finds him missing day after day. At the few recitations he does attend, he comes unprepared.

Then comes the first midterm and he fails miserably. Back in his cranium the instructor makes a mental notation that this particular student is indifferent and disinterested.

Then comes a turn in affairs. Somewhere in the last lap of the term the student wakes up. He suits gambling with the course. His actual ability asserts itself and he begins to turn out passing work. The instructor is surprised. Most likely he is also suspicious. It takes many a good recitation or paper to correct the original impression. It may never be corrected. In the final summing up at the end of the term, the professor may not feel justified in passing the student, even though he is convinced that the latter is capable of getting a pass, because of his first grades were so far below par.

Midterms are on tap during this week and next. First impressions will be made by dozens, as in many lecture courses this will be the initial contact between instructor and student. Many courses will be passed or failed this week. Cautious students will see to it that the first impression will be favorable.—Ohio State Lantern.

TIME EXTENDED FOR PICTURES

Because of the large number of students who have made appointments for individual pictures for "Everybody's Cornhusker" at Townsend's, the dead-line for sittings has been extended to Saturday evening. Any students who have not yet had their Cornhusker pictures taken, are urged to make their appointments immediately. Saturday evening is absolutely the last chance for the taking of individual pictures.
