

TWENTY SIX SECTS OR DENOMINATIONS IN THE UNIVERSITY

Methodists Head the List in Number of Students According to the Registrar

(University Publicity Office).

Twenty-six denominations or sects are represented among the students at the University of Nebraska, according to a survey made by Registrar Florence I. McGahay from the personal cards filled out by students when registering. Over a fourth are members or adherents of the Methodist church which leads the list, followed in order by the Presbyterian, the Congregational, and the Christian. Of the 5,345 students now registered, 4,579 indicated their church membership or preference. Figures for the year 1921-1922 were not completed but according to 1920-1921 tabulations, 4,200 students then indicated their membership or affiliation.

TO PRESENT FRENCH COMEDY AT TEMPLE

taken successfully the role of the invalid, although mortally stricken with tuberculosis at the time.

The play belongs to a group of comedies by Moliere, all of which brilliantly and pitilessly satirize the medical profession as it had long been satirized throughout the middle ages. It was first staged in 1673.

Moliere shows himself in this work a matchless observer of the faults and foibles of mankind and owes his great and lasting success to his ability in portraying them in such a way as to make his audiences see themselves as they are. His motto seems to be:

"There is nothing true without its humorous aspect, and there is nothing really humorous that is not strictly true." Long before Barnum, he capitalized the fondness of mankind for being fooled. He is the most representative French writer of all literature, possessing the divine "spark." He will live with the great literary immortals.

In Act I we find the imaginary invalid, Argan, estimating the cost of his innumerable prescriptions and lamenting the heartless indifference of his family toward his fancied ailments. His daughter, Angellique, enters and affords him an opportunity for acquainting her with his decision to marry her to a young physician, Thomas Diafoirus, presumably that free medical attendance may ever be at hand. But Angellique, like other young ladies before and since her time, has views of her own (having met Cleante). Her servant and confidante, Toinette, and her uncle, Beralde, loyally support her in these views. Beline, Angellique's stepmother, destines her insubordinate daughter for the convent, that the invalid's fortune may be entirely hers. Thomas calls, accompanied by his doting father, and, with his blatant platitudes and ridiculous Latinisms, still further antagonizes the young lady. Cleante, on the contrary, under the cloak of a music lesson, still further strengthens the affections of Angellique, but totally alienates the sympathy of the father by his candid criticisms of the latter's selfishness. The climax comes when, at Toinette's suggestion, Argan feigns death that he may discern the real attitude of the family toward himself. Beline, of course, hopelessly involves herself; Angellique proves a loving and dutiful daughter, and Argan can only console himself for the loss of a doctor in the family by turning doctor and dosing himself with prescriptions to his heart's content.

Y.W.C.A. CELEBRATES FIFTIETH BIRTHDAY

Organization First Established November 12, 1872, in Illinois

November 12 marks the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Young Women's Christian Association. At the instigation of Lida Brown McMurry, six young women of the Illinois State Normal University met for an informal prayer meeting November 12, 1872. Out of this grew the Young Ladies' Christian Association. In 1881 the name was changed to the present form. Similar movements started in Michigan, Iowa, and Wisconsin. Local organizations grew into state and finally in 1886 the states banded into a national Y. W. C. A.

Today there are over one thousand organizations in the United States alone. Great Britain, Norway, Sweden and the United States became charter members in the World's Young Women's Christian Association. A girl entering Y. W. C. A. today unites herself with nearly a million Christian women and girls in forty countries.

The Young Women's Christian Association stands today as the interpreter of life to young women. It has adapted itself to the increasing complexity of present day living, and has undertaken a wonderful program of work to help young women and girls to grow physically, socially, intellectually, and spiritually into the finest type of womanhood. In business districts, in factory centers, in the small town and in the country, in professional schools, in devastated war areas, in the Orient—wherever there is a need for constructive work among women, there will be found a Young Women's Christian Association.

DIRECTORIES READY.

At last the announcement comes that the student directories will be ready tomorrow. The issue this year is not later than in previous years, but because of the need for the directories students are impatient for their appearance. The information contained in the student directory is worth far more than the small price at which the book is sold.

Demand for Teachers of Economics Grows

(University Publicity Office).

That there is a demand for teachers of economics in many of the leading universities of the country, as well as an increasing tendency toward the introduction of the subject into the curricula of high schools, is indicated in letters received by Dean J. E. LeRossignol of the College of Business Administration. The University of California, among others, has written the dean to ask about prospective candidates for teaching fellowships in economics. There are twenty open for next year. Ewald T. Grether, '22, this year holds one of these fellowships. He writes that "there are quite a large number of Nebraskans out here and we will probably perfect some sort of an organization. I have met so many from Nebraska (former graduate students, etc.) that Berkeley seems a transplanted Lincoln." Mr. Grether is at work on a critical study of the economics of John Hobson. At Nebraska, he was a fellow in economics and a
