TRUE SCHOLARSHIP
Higher education in America today seems to develop practical men rather than scholars. Our culture is drifting into the control of industry and commerce. We seem to more interested in increasing the prestige and prowess of our Alma Mater in numbers, equipment and sports rather than in scholarship. Colleges are continually expanding through the generosity of graduates; they are experiencing an unexampled prosperity. A university must have money and support to carry on its work, but the securing of funds and college administrations are means, not ends.
A college education should develop character; it should unfold harmoniously the spiritual, intellectual, physical and social aspects of man's nature. It should fit him not for life but for living. It should teach him to form his own opinions and not to accept by rote the thoughts of others. The practical, technical training might better be given in a specialized school for that purpose.
Scholars and professors are often so burdened with courses, executive and meetings, and classes so large that they become mere business administrators. The pupil of genius is forced down to the average standard. The good teacher is so involved in a cruel machinery of schedules that his enthusiasm and individualism are lost. The student develops more through contacts than through subjects. A stifling organization prevents a sufficiently personal and friendly contact between professors and undergraduates, especially in the earlier years.
The great colleges of higher learning are becoming not so much cultural centers as centers of sport, business and social life. Intellectual life is being submerged. Education is too much subsidized that it may bring comfort and success in life instead of being the agent to quicken mental and spiritual activities. Admittedly the other functions of social mixers and foresters of sport are of prime importance, but in the last analysis they are supplemental. Material success is not the measure of all things.
The true college does not need great buildings, marble halls or expensive equipment. The influence of intellect on character come first. Learning can only be developed by learning. The substance and spirit of education, not its parades and degrees must receive greatest honour.—McGill Daily.

Students at the University of Indiana who wish to have cars at school must apply to an executive committee. The committee uses as its deciding factors the moral and scholastic standing of the individual.
