There is nothing the home folks would appreciate more than a really good photograph of yourself. A glimpse into Townsend's display windows on South Eleventh street will demonstrate the superiority of their portraiture. Here "you will always find familiar faces."—Adv.

World Court Talk
Those who are opposed to the proposal that the United States participate immediately and without condition in the work of the World Court thus becoming a member state, are accused of being isolationists, of working against world peace, and of being unwilling to substitute law for war. Nothing could be more unfounded and foolish than this accusation. It betrays a tragic lack of objectivity on the part of most of the propagandists for the World Court. They are under the spell of a great idea; to them the World Court issue has become the symbol and test of America's willingness to co-operate with other nations in the effort to diminish the chances of war. Being in this subjective frame of mind they are impatient with those who insist upon examining the World Court proposal without parti pris.

Herein lies the danger. Instead of educating public opinion the World Court propagandists are endeavoring to stampede it. From senate chamber to college mass meeting the World Court issue is being presented as the great choice between following the path toward peace or the path toward war. In the senate in public mass meetings, as it seems to be, that is all right. In the colleges it is all wrong. College students should be kept free of mass meetings and propaganda on this question. It should remain an academic question—mark the word!

The entry of the United States into the World Court may be a wise thing and it may help the cause of world peace. But only if the American people have first—not afterward, but first—made definite stipulations governing their participation in the tribunal and have had these stipulations understood and accepted by the other states.

1. We want to be sure that the World Court, although it may have been created as a result of an article in the League Covenant, is not an organ of or dependent in any way on the League of Nations. We want to be sure that our entry into the World Court will not commit us, even indirectly, to the endorsement of or guaranteeing League policies. This is far more important than it seems on the surface. The European powers which control the Council of the League of Nations submit to the World Court only questions which they cannot settle themselves or for which they want a wide international "moral underwriting" of the decision. We shall be the only Great Power on the bench of the Court which is not a member of the League Council. When our representative is simply a judge helping to render the verdict in accordance with the evidence, or the technicalities of the law, is it not possible to suppose, unless the contrary is clearly understood before we enter the Court, that his vote may be taken to imply the approval or disapproval of the United States in some question that it is to our interest to avoid getting mixed up with?

2. We want to be sure that membership in the Court cannot be used either (a) to bring this country before the bar of the World Court in the settlement of a question that we do not care to submit to it, or (b) to marshal world-wide public opinion against us in case we have refused to submit a moot question to the Court.

3. We want to be sure that our membership in the Court will not result in an effort on the part of the countries outside of the western hemisphere to bring before the World Court international questions in which the vital interests of North or South American countries are affected.—University Daily Kansan.

Unjustified Existence

Some one had the audacity once to assert that if institutions and individuals were to be permitted to exist, they should be forced to justify their existence. If a law could be passed—and enforced—which made a requirement of this kind, several of our most cherished institutions might wake up some morning to find themselves in oblivion.

The university student hears two conflicting varieties of advice—one, to get into campus activities and organizations, as they provide the best part of college experience; the other, that the eternal round of committee and club meetings, and all the other ramifications of activities, are a waste of valuable time and energy. With the latter idea we are inclined to agree.

Every campus organization means a group of members who must attend a meeting of the club every week, or, at best, every two weeks. Just what is accomplished at the meetings of these social, honorary and departmental clubs apparently no one has been able to discover. The members go, spend their time, perhaps devise ways and means of financing the next social function of the group, and return to their homes. Wherein lies the value of all this as training for facing the problems of life?

There are several useless and defunct organizations on our campus—some whose only purpose seems to be to afford their members an opportunity to wear unusual and far-from-beautiful headgear, or to make another addition to the collection of hardware adorning the vest in the region over the heart. Many students belong to so many organizations that if they wore all their pins they would look like French war heroes in all their medals.

Why should a student engage in activities that can be of no possible benefit to him or to anyone else? We venture the opinion that a great number of them do so only because it is considered the thing to do. Our admiration is reserved for the student who refuses to waste his time on anything that he is not convinced is really worth while.—The Indiana Daily Student.

LEROSSIGNOL IS FORUM SPEAKER ON WEDNESDAY

a college course of four years, then four years of medicine, then two or three years as interne in the hospital, and then wait several years—until they are over thirty—before they have a practice and can afford to marry.

"This looks like a splendid preparation for one's life work, but it is open to several serious objections. One is that a young man may defer his professional training until he has acquired rigid, academic habits of thought, while he has lost something of his adolescent enthusiasm, his memory is not quite so retentive, nor his senses and muscles so easily trained as in his earlier years.

"Another objection is that, by the constant raising of standards and requirements, the number of men entering the profession is restricted, fees tend to be higher and many of the country districts are inadequately supplied with medical service or are without it altogether.

"From this it seems to follow that, for a majority of medical students the combined usual course of six or seven years is sufficient; although, for those who can afford it, a full four years' arts course, with some specialization in science, is to be recommended, though with some reservations.

Teaching Requirements Vary

"In preparation for the profession of teaching, the requirements vary according to the end in view. Usually we say that a college instructor should have his bachelor's degree and his doctor's degrees, although it is generally admitted that he should specialize more or less during his college course. This is the custom in the British and Canadian universities, where the honor courses often begin in the first and second years.

"In preparation for high school teaching, a college course is usually required and, often, a year or more of graduate work. Here, too, professional training begins in college, where students take a good many courses in the subject in which they are preparing to teach, and some of the courses in educational history and methods as well.

"As for the military science, engineering, dentistry, agriculture and some other professions, a full four year's college course is out of the question for the vast majority of the students, although nearly all would be the better of more general training than they now receive.

"Journalists, on the other hand, in view of the varied fields of learning with which they have to do, could profit by a full four years' college course and a good deal of graduate work, all of which could be cultural and vocational at the same time.

Cultural and Vocational Not Distinct

"In fact, there is no definite line to be drawn between the cultural and the vocational, inasmuch as all cultural studies have some vocational values, and all vocational work and though has more or less of culture inseparably connected with it. Culture, in short, is a by-product of all human life and thought.

"As to university training for business, a limited number of very competent students might well postpone their professional training until the close of their college course, and then take the graduate work at Harvard or Leland Stanford. But for the vast majority of students this is quite impracticable and probably undesirable.

Business men like to take young people into their employment at a fairly early age, while they are yet teachable, adaptable, ready to begin at the bottom, willing to learn, willing to work for a small salary and to wait for promotion until they have learned something of the business.

For these and other reasons, our undergraduate courses in business administration, which are equivalent to an arts course with specialization in business subjects, are long enough for most students, and the age at which our graduates enter business is none too early.

Expect Junior College to Help

"Probably the improvement of the high school and the development of the junior college will help to solve many of these problems, by throwing most of the general training into the high school and the junior college and most of the professional work into the university.

"In dealing with a subject so complicated and difficult as this, it is well to consider suggestions from all quarters, to adapt our educational theories to the requirements for our environment, to remember that schooling and education are not identical, to see that culture can exist outside of college walls, and to keep both professional and cultural ideals in view, so that the practical and the ideal may go hand in hand.
