MUNGER SPEAKS AT CONVOCATION

voice unintelligible, so a low pitched tone is necessary.

English Law is Speedy
English law, he told the audience, is very speedy; Judge Munger then related the murder case which he had witnessed the trial of while in England. The whole process including the impanelling of the jury, hearing of both sides, the discussion, the verdict rendered by the jury, and the sentence by the judge took just fifty-three minutes. Comparing this speedy dispersal of justice with our long drawn out murder trials that sometimes run into weeks and months before any decision is reached, he explained the reason as due to the way in which they handle their witnesses, never questioning them more than from three to fifteen minutes. The judge having complete charge of the case can direct it; the different system of lawyers used there where a solicitor looks up all of the evidence, makes a brief of it, and gives it to the barrister who presents the case before the court with never having spoken to his defendant or the main witnesses.

In his closing remarks, Judge Munger expressed regret that with all of our commercial advances, our advances in science and in other ways, that we should be so far behind in our administration of justice, and that our laws and practices should be so filled with technicalities that make justice so hard to administer. He expressed his hope for our future law system in the law schools of the country, and in the proper training of young lawyers.
