Selling Russian Art. New York Evening Post: As long as Russian art treasures confiscated by the soviet government remain in Russia there can be no doubt, things being as they are, who owns them. But when they are sold to other countries the validity of title may be called in question by courts which do not admit the Bolshevik principle that "all art objects belong to the proletariat." Certain treasures said to belong to Russians now exiled are listed for sale at auction in Berlin next week, and an injunction has been sought in German courts. The foreign office is trying to dodge the issue, not wishing to offend Germany's best customer. But the allies are determined and are planning to attack the titles of the objects in question both in Germany and wherever they may be taken. This is only one incident indicating how difficult it is to fit Bolshevik principles with the ideas of the sanctity of private property obtaining among civilized nations.
