The dean said that the person with a liberal education was expected to be acquainted with the English language and be able to express himself. He said the person should have an appreciation of the literature of his own language. Dean Hicks stated that many stucents did not care for poetry, novels, or the other forms of liter-ature, but that they could learn to like them in the same way that he learned to like spinach.

He pointed out that students could widen their horizons by prying into another language. Dean Hicks stated that he thought it was pitiful that many people who could express themselves well in English neglected to familiarize themselves with another tongue.
