A SUMMER NEBRASKAN.

FOR THE first time under university auspices in the thirty-six consecutive years that summer sessions have been held at Nebraska, a summer Nebraskan is being published. It will appear twice weekly — on Tuesday and Friday mornings.

Its purpose is evident. It will bring to student attention all official announcements of the university. It will include new accounts of all campus happenings throughout nine weeks of summer school. It will publish feature stories which contain bits of interesting information concerning the school which 3,000 young men and women are attending this summer.

From time to time it will chronicle news of other summer schools which will be of interest to Nebraskans. Its editorial column will contain comment on situations and happenings pertaining to the university of Nebraska specifically to education generally, and to subjects of vital interest to young people.

Because there are no organizations to bind summer students together, because there are no functions of a social nature which tend to promote any feeling of university consciousness during the summer sessions, there is an absence of interest in the university.

To stimulate that interest, to work for ways and means of bringing the students together, and to promote a feeling of friendliness among all summer attendants is this paper's purpose.

If The Nebraskan is going to serve the students in this way, however, it is imperative that it be supported by these students. Without student backing The Summer Nebraskan is a fruitless enterprise.

While summer students are here primarily to study and to take advantage of the many facilities the university has available for them, they must be urged in addition to keep abreast of the news of the school they are attending.

Young people who take away something of tangible or intangible value from a school like Nebraska must give back something in return, not in the form of money but in the shape of a keen regard for the welfare of that institution which has given them a needed intellectual boost.
