

Vocational, Social, Personal Hopes Comprise Miss M. Schroeder's Essay

Miss Maude E. Schroeder of Holbrook is the author of an essay which placed in the prize column of the contest conducted by the chancellor on "What I Aim to Get Out of College."

My entrance into the University of Nebraska was the response to a great restlessness. I was dissatisfied with my work, with the returns from my work, and most of all with myself.

There is no reason for considering the vocational purpose first, because in a well rounded life all the phases are indispensable, but it was my original aim as a freshman.

I might have secured training by starting as a jack-of-all trades on a small town newspaper, but such preparation would be more likely to fix my crudities than remove them.

There is much content in the consciousness of work well done, but work is not its own compensation. The comforts and leisure assured by a good salary are powerful inducements.

I have called this training social, although our social relations extend into business also. From choice and necessity we human beings live in close contact.

The activities in which students are engaged together enable a person of any initiative to develop his powers of leadership.

HECTOR AND ADELAIDE, IN PENN WOODS DENOTE COMING OF SPRING.

Temperature Rising.

Adelaide appears to be crouching. Her lips would be quivering timorously if pictures could move, so that much will have to be taken for granted.

Hector Hesitant.

Sixteen Pinkerton detectives and a plain clothes man are hidden in the bushes. That may account for Hector's hesitancy.

Fit More Snugly.

Here is the two button, form fitting jacket popular this year. Men's suits show a decided trend away from the loose, ill fitting models of a few seasons back.

otherwise have remained mere dreams.

Beyond citizenship and leadership we may use the term "social" in its more common application. The ability to talk on many subjects, an appearance that is a credit instead of a handicap, ease in any company—these are not insignificant qualities.

College offers social development, and I intend to take advantage of every possibility it presents. A vocation is not enough; I want to be an asset to society, a leader in my small way, and an intelligent, sympathetic friend.

My third aim is constantly growing in importance; it is assuming the proportions of the hypotenuse in my three-sided college course. It would be hard to name, but it is easy to recognize it because it is common to all men.

That is the satisfaction of intellectual and spiritual hunger. When a child in the early teens I used to pound the window pane with my doubled fists crying, "I want! I want! I want!"

Probably the first step toward reaching a satisfying mental level is wiping away tradition. Nothing can do this better than college.

The cultivation of taste is not snobbery, but a means of finding great pleasure. I am studying literature and philosophy far more than my graduation requirements demand, because these fields offer inspiration and partial content.

Am I asking too much of college? These three things I want from my four years at the university: vocational training that will teach me to achieve more and serve better; social development to make me a benefit to my community and the circle of my associates; and cultivation of my tastes and intellect that will make life to me richer and more enjoyable, not marked with discontent.

The capacity to appreciate what is artistic, beautiful, wise, cannot be overdeveloped. It makes even poverty endurable, and solitude less desolate.

Stages Return

Belted back top coats are being worn by smart university men this season. These coats, practically extinct for several seasons until last fall, have staged a complete comeback this year.

The gist of the whole thing is that "it seems to be spring."

That's the whole thing in an instant. It is spring, and there can be no wonderment as to what Hector will do after the picture is drawn and the story is finished.
