Posture Week Finds Phys Ed Majors Busy Trying to Ban the Coed Slump

How's your posture? If it's not so good you'd better go into hiding, for this is Posture Week, and the junior and senior majors in physical education for women are conducting a campaign to do away once and for all with the coed slump.

Posters depicting vividly the results of poor posture have been put up in all buildings on the campus, with the hope that all who see them may take heed. A more direct means of stimulating correct posture among collegians is through classes in physical education, to each of which a major student in physical education has been assigned. She has divided the class as to good, medium, and poor posture, has given the students colored tags to indicate their standing, (we're not trying to be funny) and is helping them to improve their posture.

Little lectures on proper carriage and its relation to mental and physical well-being are being given in physical education classes by these same major students, who are Doris Deford, Agnes Grover, Grace Morgan, Irene Nabity, Nola O'Connor, Margaret Reedy, Ruth Shellburg, and Mary Ulrich.

Miss Clara Reedy is supervising the campaign. It's the first "Posture Drive" to be conducted on the campus, and altho the appeal this year is made directly only to students in physical education classes, which include basketball, dancing, swimming, volley ball, ping pong, clogging, and individual gymnastics, it is hoped to enlarge the scope of the campaign if it is conducted again next year.
