'NINETIES' INFLUENCE FALL COAT FASHIONS

Mae West is the most attractive reason for the fall trends in dress coats this season following somewhat the influence of the Gay Nineties period. Her individual style is seen in full sleeve treatments with tight sleeves from the elbow down and interesting neck and shoulder treatments. Waistlines, however, in the new models are not so pinched in.

The silhouette is interesting. Showing a coat emphasizing slenderness from the waist down to the hemline and width from elbow to shoulders. This width is achieved by soft manipulations in the upper part of the sleeve either in cloth or fur treatments, and too, by the closings which are definitely one sided and are fastened by very smart shaped buttons and clips and also short ties which are arranged more artistically than ever before.

Sleeves are the keynote to the correct styling of this season's models. They are fashioned so as to definitely bring out the width of the shoulders. Epaulets, godets and soft drapes help to emphasize this width.

It is expected that the informal coat will play an important part in the new season for these coats are so styled and made of such fabrics that they can advantageously be used for both informal and semi-formal wear. Coats are attracted to the two purposes for one garment idea and for this reason and also because of the excellent styling sponsored it looks as if the informal coat has a bright future ahead of it.

However, there is also seen in these informal models a modified swagger type—by modified is not as flaring and swagger as the spring models were but nevertheless a swagger coat in its general styling. The new swagger outline is more trim and neat in appearance and is shown in a straighter box type effect.

CONTEMPORARY COMMENT

Dollars and Bloodshed.

The fact that money-minded America puts the sacrosanct dollar above human life and liberty has been no where more apparent than in this country's treatment of Cuba.

The now exiled Machado was able to keep in power so many years because he saw to it that American business interests in Cuba were not molested. He might murder political opponents and confiscate their property, but so long as he maintained a hands off policy toward America there was no cry for intervention.

But when the Cubans themselves put an end to the reign of murder and ruthless lawlessness, there came an immediate howl in America for the president to send the marines to Cuba.

The first and second revolutions in Cuba had different purposes. The first was aimed to end the reign of terrorism. The second was tantamount to a revolt against American business dominance of the island, and as such it has aroused a great deal of concern in Americans who have investments in Cuba.

Because Cuba's troubles were largely caused by American interference and because intervention is strongly objected to by other Spanish-American countries, the United States should not take part in a reconstruction movement where it clearly is not wanted.

If America does jump into the Cuban squabble, it will put itself in the same class with Japan which decided that its investments in Manchuria should be protected.—Daily Oklahoman.
