Capt. G. W. Sperry Defends Army And Navy as Organizations Fostering Good Citizenship in United States

"The primary mission of the United States army is to guarantee the continued existence of the government by the people in these United States against all internal and external enemies of whatsoever nature," stated Capt. G. W. Sperry, instructor in the military department in his article "The Army Promotes Good Citizenship," which appeared in a recent issue of the Army and Navy Journal.

He writes that this has been done in many instances and may be done again during the life of our government, by resort to battle. Through the years, however, the army has learned that there are often times other and better ways of meeting and conquering the enemies who would destroy us and that is by making better and more loyal citizens of the inhabitants.

"It is a recognized fact, and may be stated without fear of contradiction, that there exists in the United States no national organization, other than the army and navy, which inspires men to become better citizens; that stands ever ready to enforce the orders of the people through their legal representatives; that is free from draft and corruption; that has no political preferences; and that can point to one hundred and fifty years of honorable and faithful service.

Army Does Not Incite War. He states that it has been said utterly without foundation, that the army incites war and makes militarists of the youth of the nation. Army men and their families abhor war because it strikes their homes first. The army has nothing to do with declaring war. Such declarations are made by civil authorities upon failing to make a settlement with their adversaries. Even then the army only fights long enough to enable the authorities to come in and make the settlement.

"The army not only instructs its own personnel along the lines above mentioned, but does more, and each year conducts such a course in the many Citizens' Military Training camps for over 35,000 boys, boys in whom we find the men of tomorrow. The more ambitious of these boys, attend our high schools, colleges and universities, and there come in contact with the junior and senior units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. The demand for additional units by schools every-
