Union College President Suggests Requirement for College Entrance Demanding Intellectual Proficiency

Dr. Ellory groups subjects of study according to three or four logical divisions: (1) a division of fine arts, music, painting and sculpture; (2) a division of languages; (3) a division of mathematics and science, including technology; and (4) a division of social studies. The one unalterable requirement is three units of school English, for "no boy should come to college who is unable to express his ideas in clear and correct English both spoken and written. Proficiency in any one of these fields is sufficient evidence that the student is college material. At Union college the admissions board is now responsible, not only for admitting a student, but for placing him in one of the groups of study."

"After a student is admitted and properly placed," Dr. Ellory continues, "a college faculty supervises his career in a particular field, and especially in the junior practice of standardized entrance requirements and curricula." Men's Publication, 'Esquire,' Will Now Appear Each Month

Release of the second issue of that magazine which caused varying comment with its first issue, "Esquire," plainly and boldly marked "for men," will only serve again to direct attention to the publication.

An array of writers and artists, who contributed the first edition, return almost without exception in the second release. Art Editor John Groth's work is again as interesting as was his work in the first issue.

New Policy Started.

This issue marks the beginning of a new policy for the magazine. A first released and intended as a quarterly, the demands for more have caused the publishers and editors to make the magazine a monthly publication.

Chief in interest to the reading public at large should be the Spanish letter on bullfights, stranded Americans writers, and Spain in general by the talented, if somewhat morbid, Ernest Hemingway. Talented Hemingway is his usual self in this first article.

Miller and Contributors.

Ex-president Alexander Miller and of France and Owen Johnson, both writers on the international situation, present different views of France. Other non-fiction writers are Fred C. Kelly, Edward M. Barrows, Frederick Van Ryn, Louis Joseph Vance, Louis Golding and Pitts Sanborn.

The inclusion in the magazine of the various departments, dealing with the stage, radio, books, and others, ends one very definite need that was felt in the first "Esquire." John V. A.
