The nazi brand of fascism is still in an in describe le state of flux, and it is therefore hazardous to venture any generalizations concerning it. The bserver will find, however, that there are striking parallels between the anti-democratic movements of Germany and Italy.

Fascism in Italy was largely product of the aftermath of the World war. Though one of the great powers which "won" the war, Italy came out of the great conflict in a particularly bitter and sullen mood. Since Italy did not enter the war until ten months after it started, the Italian people had ample time to debate the question of participation, and when the war was over, many were bitter against those who were responsible dislocated the economic life of Italy as indeed it affected the economic structures of every country, including our own. Furthermore, Italy had to fall back upon her own resources after the war, and the government had to meet $2,000,000,000 of obligations maturing by 1920.

Inflation was the consequence, and prices rose accordingly. Since wages did not rise fast enough the workers began to agitate, and finally they struck. Italy's in-dustrial unrest was due to postexpenses, inflation, higher prices and a higher cost of living. Communist propaganda was a fac-tor, but not a fundamental one.

Complete Breakdown. In post war Italy, too, there existed a difficult political situa-tion. No party was able to form a government in the chamber, and no stable coalition seemed possible Parliament was in a state of semiparalysis. From these various causes, there seemed to be a combreakdown of social dis-was distress, but this happened all over the world, including the United States. It would be absurd to deny that Italy was then passing thru a severe crisis, but it was crisis of readjustment, not of disorganization. Italy was a recovering patient.

Ultra-Revolutionary.

During the two critical years of 1919 and 1920, Mussolini was an ultra-revolutionary. He urged that nothing short of a proletarian revolution would suffice to establish social justice. He demanded the overflow of the monarchy, and the The establishment of a republic. workers, in his view, should share in the management of industry. He approved and encouraged the occupation of the factories by the workers in August and September, 1920. Mussolini opposed the socialism, not because they were revolutionary, but because as revolutionaries, they were incapable.

The end of the revolutionary threat came with the failure of the occupation of the factories in the fall of 1920, and the split between the socialists and the communists in January, 1921. Thus Mussolini wrote, on July 2, 1921: "To say that there exists a Bolshevist peril in Italy is, for interested motives to substitute fears for reality. Bolshevism has been vanquished."
