SEND HIM A RADISH CORSAGE, lisped Miss Advice to Girls, and of course she was referring to nothing more or less than the Mortar Board party Friday evening. The one evening of the year when Nebraska's masculine element can repay any enormous dinner bills or exorbitant charges that their dates have piled up on them during the season, the one evening when the gals will have to carry shaving kits, wallets, and other manly trifles, the Leap Year party is certainly not an occasion to be ignored. But even considering the possibility of buying a steak dinner will not keep the average co-ed at home. Friday offers that long sought for event that will allow that old feminine desire to lead to come forth and what's more, it will permit the choice of a congenial double date. Judging pro and con, then, it follows that dancing to Carleton Coon with the a. o. n. this week end is something not to be missed—so find yourself a date—lots of campus big shots haven't been taken yet—and sally forth Friday. It will be something to tell your grandchildren about.

SEEN ON the campus: Dotty Clark and Dotty Husted playing bridge with various members of the football team—Phi Psi brethren emerging from the chapter house on one of the first warm days to view the passers by... Clayton Schwenk lugging an over-ripe banana around in his coat pocket... Bob Hockenberry playing his usual afternoon game of contract... Don Wake and Bruce Nicoll expounding on the ideal woman... Tom Davies carefully lifting his books from the ground in front of "Soak"... Harvey Widman struggling manfully with Spartacus' speech to the Roman gladiators as Prof. Yenne's students suddenly turn shouting warriors... and John Groth and Jarmin meandering thru the Moon.

Oz Black Resorted To Cartoons When Stumped By Exam In 'Psych'

—Courtesy Lincoln Sunday Journal-Star.

Lack of knowledge expressed in a new and refreshing way, at least as far as examination papers are concerned, was rediscovered by Dr. W. E. Walton, assistant professor of psychology at the University of Nebraska. The above sketches were done by Oz Black, cartoonist for The Lincoln News, thirteen years ago when he was taking an examination in philosophy 100 under Dr. J. P. Gullford, who was at that time a graduate assistant at the university.

Unable to answer the questions in the test, Black expressed his guilt by the two drawings. Evidently he had read some of the assigned chapter for he was able to finish a part of the first question which dealt with animal activities. Memory failed him as he attempted to go deeper into the subject and Black breaks off in the middle of the sentence, unable to finish. The cartoon of the man on the stump is his confession. Probably because a part of the test dealt with the animal kingdom, he labeled the mouse "Psych."

The next question, "Discuss the significance of cerebral hemispheres in the light of Judd's chapter," met with a similar fate. "No use bluffing," says Mr. Black. "I didn't read the entire chapter." Then follows the cartoon showing the judge and his guilty victim. The test paper was dated Oct. 27, 1922 when Dr. Winifred Hyde was chairman of the psychology department. Black was a junior in school.

steadily. At times her work was very good—other times it was uncertain and somewhat forced. She seemed to lack a full sympathy for and definite idea of the character. Irving Hill, as John Clayne, gave a good, but rather puzzling interpretation. Taking his character individually and in relation to that of Miss Carpenter, it was well done. But in relation to its apparent place in the play, and the impression given by the lines of the other characters, it was somewhat misleading.

Clare Wolf, as Cecil Hervey, apparently lacked a clear idea of the character, for no definite picture was presented. There was a need of real depth and freedom. Elizabeth Betzer, as Marjorie Hervey, and Era Brown as Williams, carried their roles well. The guest scene at the wedding was well done, with each of the characters presenting a different character.

Play Confusing.

The play, itself, was most confusing. At times it touched on a form of social satire, then returned to an involved character study, turned again to evoke thoughts of possible symbolism, and then took an undecided step toward some deeper theme. It was extremely padded, unnecessarily so, containing much material with no real relation to the play and of a nature usually considered to be in the province of the novel. It was greatly lacking in concentration, and the death in Act II can only be considered as an act of God and these, introduced in just

Copies Bushman Arts on Display in Morrill Hall

An interesting and historically valuable collection of copies of African bushmen rock paintings done by Brother Otto of the Mariannhill monastery, Union of South Africa, are on exhibit in gallery A of Morrill hall. The public is invited to see the display which will remain here until Dec. 16.

Found in South Africa.
These early works of art by African tribesmen are found throughout the rocky stretches and caves of South Africa wherever rivers and streams have cut out ravines or "kloofs." The paintings are still visible, being superimposed one upon another in many layers, which are believed to date back to prehistoric times.

Figures on the walls which were done in black are later paintings, while those done in several colors are comparatively recent. Earlier figures show a succession of plain colorings, of which dark claret is probably the earliest represented on the Kei river.

Paintings Disappearing.
Chief pigments used were ochres and other mineral earths, either raw or burnt, finely ground and mixed with some substance such as fat or marrow. The paintings are fast disappearing, hence the value of such careful records as illustrated by Brother Otto's collection. Some experts believe these works of art, done probably for the purpose of entertaining members of the tribes and not for the sake of art, are thousands of years old.

The observer will note that the paintings of animals are far more realistic than those of men, although scenes in which man is the principal attraction are highly descriptive of man's activity at that time.

practically the same audience, must work.

Clare Christensen, as Mildred Surragge, gave a most consistent, convincing performance. She seemed perfectly at ease thru the play. She did not overplay the role, nor did she at any time make one feel that she was only acting. Her work carried thru steadily, and was on a level with that of Miss Carpenter and Mr. Buell. Of these three, it would be difficult and unfair to place one above the other. Essentially different roles, they were all splendidly done.

Portia Boynton, as Lena Surragge, also presented some excellent work, but was not nearly so such a manner have little place on the stage. The first half of the play becomes very tiresome—one waits for the play to really start; and just the opposite may be said of the last half. Thruout one wonders just where the play is going and the final curtain doesn't seem to bring much of a solution. But there is some excellent comedy, and dramatic emotion—enough to make an evening at the Temple theater very worth while.
