PUPPETEER SARG

Imperial Highness the Maharaja of Gekwa's Royal Juggler, Tippytoes the Ballerina, the Snake Charmer and Tony Sarg, Living Marionette, in turn took the stage in this "Hour with Tony Sarg." George's head was formed by the ingenious device of a doubled fist being thrust under a tiny wig, facial features being painted on the back of the hand. Tippytoes performed her "daring feats with the aid of a complex arrangement of 25 strings. Lightning sketches of Ferdinand the Bull and a member of the audience, and masterful impersonations brought cheers and applause from the audience.

More than 20 years have elapsed since Mr. Sarg opened with his first marionette show in this country, in the neighborhood playhouse in New York City. Twenty-seven operators were used in that first production, with a stage large enough for a man and marionettes three feet high. A tiny marionette orchestra furnished "accompaniment."

Five Work Shops.

Today Tony Sarg is the proprietor of the Tony Sarg Marionette company, which travels thruout the United States from October until May, 30,000 miles during a season. He is the owner of five workshouses in New York City, one "as big as an armory." In this shop the gigantic hall-room monsters used in Macy's st. parade are made. By profession Mr. Sarg is an illustrator and painter, his illustrations of humorous stories for Saturday Evening Post, Red Book, Collier's, Cosmopolitan and other magazines being well known. His murals are found in various cities thruout the country.

Sarg was born in Guatemala, Central America, in 1882. His father was a German ambassador, his mother an Englishwoman. He lived in Guatemala until he was 8, when he was entered in a German military school. Later, when he was about 23, he resigned his position as an officer and went to England as an illustrator.

Sarg's first studio was in Fleet st. in the Old Curiosity Shoppe made famous by Dickens. When the war broke out, Sarg left England, where he had become a naturalized citizen, and came to the United States, where he again was naturalized. His first studio was at the top of the Flatiron building at 5th ave. and 23rd st.

Sarg states that there is now a revival of the marionette show greater in the United States than in any other country, and predicts an even greater interest in the future.

A fascinating study of exotic birds is "Feathered Friends." Cat lovers will be charmed by "Felicity," Agnes Tait's portrait of a languorous black cat, and by its companion piece, "Aristocrat." Nura's decorative print, "Four of a Kind," Harry Sternberg's stunning aqua-tint, "Steel Mill," John Marin's "Sail Boat," Benton Spruance's "The Fencers" and Warren Newcombe's "Anna Karenina in Hollywood," attract attention at once.
