Editorially Speaking

Circulation Desk Democracy

Over the circulation desk in the reading room of the university library pass hundreds of books each day. Presiding at the desk are efficient, well-trained librarians who render valuable aid in the way of information and help to the students.

Considering the facilities with which the library employees must work, no one can say the library system is inefficient. The regulations of the system, however, are not so irrefragable. In any democratic institution such as the university purports to be, justice to all is the policy. The library admits as much by stating at the top of the "date due" sheet pasted in each book that, in fairness to other borrowers, the book must be returned on time.

The library, as an integral part of the university, is maintained primarily for the vast undergraduate student body. They make up the majority of the library's patrons. But the students, unfortunately, are not accorded the same privileges given to graduate students and instructors. Any student who frequents the library has, at one time or another, been courteously informed that a book he is seeking is in the hands of a graduate student who will return it at the end of the semester or in the possession of an instructor who will bring it back when he is through with it. These people are not penalized as are the students by cash penalties and two-week claims on books.

From these facts, one is forced to conclude that the library's lending policy is discriminatory and, therefore, undemocratic. Does not this mean that some revision should be made in the library rules? Some change is indicated, at least, if the library is to be called a part of a democratic institution.

The voting privilege

American citizenship is regarded by every true American as sacred. Among the many privileges that citizenship offers is the right to vote and vote as one desires.

A university's objective, it seems to me, should be to make every student who goes to it, a more cultured learned citizen who can apply the knowledge he acquired to the betterment of himself and his fellow men.

It seems that this university is overlooking a chance to help the student attain better citizenship in later life by permitting such poorly run, ill managed student elections such as that of last Tuesday. These University of Nebraska elections are regarded by the large majority of the students as farces not even worth going over and voting in. Faculty members and students alike are entirely indifferent to who wins or loses. Rowdy exhibitions by small minorities before these elections result in accidents and adverse publicity for the university.

Why can't the university and its faculty "talk up" student elections by putting up posters making every student think that it is his sacred duty to vote? Why can't the administration provide more supervision to stop rumors of "dirty politics" once and for all? Our school's ruling preventing any form of written campaigning entirely dampens all spirit of "above the board" electioneering. How can any prospective voter remember all the candidates and their merits if they never hear of them a sort of romantic head of the state. Besides we believe he has a definite policy in his mind, that is more than we can say for the others. This question is very important to us, because we get to vote next time!

except by the listings in the DAILY and by word of mouth? There is no reason why each faction could not write a card or letter to each member of its party, listing its candidates, and urging them to come to vote without riots and fights resulting from it. All university publications should continue to remain entirely neutral for obvious reasons.

Why can't voting at the University of Nebraska be made a cherished privilege instead of a right that few ever appreciate or use?
