Fashion Footnotes

This thing called fashion . . .

So this is fashion edition day once again. Midsemesters and war may come and go but fashions, like football, are always with us. And so is the gullible public. For fashions in clothes, like fashions in politics and war, are arbitrarily set by someone who has something to sell. And people are gullible, as they always have been and probably always will be. Sciaparelli decrees the wasp waist and no doubt laughs up her sleeve at the contortions little girls, big girls, fat girls, and thin girls, will go through to squeeze themselves into hour-glass shapes. And what have they when they get a waist that can be encircled with one broad masculine hand, especially when the feeling is that of running up against a cast iron suit of armor. It's enough to dismay any man!

Fashion is still 'spinach' . . .

A futile word and most misused is fashion. For commercial purposes, fashion denotes "the prevailing mode" which all would-be best-dressers feel obligated to follow. And this, of course, is when the would-be best-dresser ceases to be just that. With gullibility in following fashion decrees comes the inevitable standardization and the best-dresser fashion addict is lost in the shuffle. So the actual best-dresser knows that fashion as such does not exist, it is, in truth, "spinach," something to be stuffed down the throats of unsuspecting victims because they think it's good for them. And here we come to saddest conclusion of all—that fashion is the manner in which one wears clothes and most people haven't the individualism it takes to do just that. Which leads us to a much more distracting conclusion—that without any clothes at all, we might have less to worry about!

When a fashion edition is not . . .

All you who read and heed such manner of artieled advice in this and all so-called fashion editions, remember, as you notice the amazing amount of advertising in the issue, that fashion editions are promoted primarily to exploit the wares of the stores that sell you clothes in this, and any, college town. And if you, too, might think the amount of advertising overshadows the fashion advice columns, you can put it down for certain that fashion is such a good selling point that everybody wants to advertise in an issue that's going to make the most of your gullibility . . . and mine! But, of course, someday, we'll put our heads together and make our own fashions and stores won't be obliged to carry what some far-distant fashion decreer decrees!

Neutrality—

States is significant now and will be enormous at the end of a long war when the other great powers will be exhausted. This is all the more reason why we should be willing and ready to meet with the people across the seas in formulating a political pattern that holds greater promise for international prosperity and world peace."

Dean Oldfather, who for several years was an instructor in the Syrian Protestant college at Beirut, addressed Alliance high school students and teachers Tuesday morning on "Student Life in the Near East."
