Mr. Brownell didn't say it-but

Do mounting government costs carry a double threat for university sources of revenue?

Two basic ideas occupied the Charter Day speech of Herbert Erownell in the Coliseum yesterday-two ideas which bear an interesting relationship to one another:

1. Outside financial support from sources such as alumni is needed by this university and others like it if they are to maintain their traditional positions of importance.

2. The country is faced today with the great problem of financing the vast structure of social legislation built up in the past few years.

Altho Mr. Brownell did not say so, these two financial problems instead of merely representing a similar trend seem more like a pair of crossed arrows with educational institutions the uncomfortable objects of their sharpened ends.

Mr. Brownell warned his audience that recent governmental social legislation by necessity has placed a ceiling on the share of tax money allocable to the development of higher education. At the same time, he said, sources of increased revenue must be found to finance this new legislation. But where does the university come in? Seemingly it doesn't. No longer can it count on tax money to carry on its work and less and less will alumni and philanthropists be able to make large monetary gifts as more and more new taxes, levied to finance expanding government activities, eat away at their fortunes.

Said Mr. Brownell: "This group (university students and alumni), more than any other, will be required under the pressure of recent changes, to expend more of its thought and energy in participating in the management and direction of newly created governmental functions."

And echoing in our ears is another voice which says: "This group, more than any other, will be required under the pressure of recent changes, to expend more of its monetary income and saving in participating in the financing of newly created governmental functions." For by and large it stands to reason that university graduates are the most successful figures in contemporary life and hold the greatest share of the good things. Consequently they are the ones likely to be hit the hardest by increased taxation.

We do not mean to take an alarmist view of the situation-there is no immediate danger of the United States becoming a proletarian state. Nevertheless, there is a definite trend away from the amassing of large fortunes, and in the years to come there will be fewer men like Rockefeller and Harkness to further the cause of education thru private endowment.

of 75,000, announced by the University Foundation from a donor whose beneficent spirit is magnified by his modest wish to remain anonymous, might appear to contradict this, but even more it seems to indicate that university would have done well to have set up the Foundation sooner. As it is, Nebraska may reap only the concluding harvests of private donations as a period of great individual fortunes draws to a close. A new economic era, based partly on so-

ROOSEVELT AND NEBRASKA

Definite evidence that President Roosevelt's name will appear on the Nebraska democratic primary ballot was made public yesterday when Charles W. Bryan filed petitions to this effect from the First and Fifth congressional districts in the office of the secretary of state. Petitions are also being circulated in the other three congressional districts, and will doubtless be filed within the next week. Under Nebraska law when petitions from all the congressional districts have been filed, each one bearing a hundred signatures, the name of the candidate will be listed on the primary ballot.

Thus it seems that Nebraska will be one of the states in which the democratic party will have an opportunity to voice its opinion on the third term question. It is rumored that the movement in Nebraska was undertaken to test the presidential popularity in the prairie states.

As yet no other candidates have filed for a place on the democratic primary ballot, but it is commonly believed that the name of Vice President Garner will appear. Supporters of Senator Wheeler, Montana liberal, have also indicated that they may seek a referendum on his popularity within the state, but Wheeler probably will make no aggressive campaign if the president countenances movements to

The German people have it on the authority of Field Marshal Herman Goering that Germany can not be defeated in the current war. At the same time he insisted that in order for the German people to be "firm and stong, it must draw strength from the soil to make it invincible." In other words, much of the success of the war will depend upon the German farmer providing for the belly upon which armies traditionally crawl.

We may be inclined to disagree with Goering's basic assertion as to the invincibility of the German might, but there is an element of truth in what the marshal says. Pointing to the food reserves which the reich possesses, Goering indicates the impossibility of a short war. Apparently the allies would do well to consider this. During the World war it was rather widely accepted that the economic systems of the belligerent powers would crack at a very early date. That this failed to happen was patent. Neither is it to be expected that in the present conflict the breakup of any of the powers will result at an early date. Watchful waiting must be the policy adopted.

Yet in the field marshal's speech one can detect a note of uneasiness. "We do not have too much (of food)" he says, while urging farmers to redouble their efforts for the coming year. This is but a logical recognition of the effect which the English blockade must eventually have. In a state in which belts have been tightened for several consecutive years, the problem of food not only becomes acute, but also is turned into one of the most errective weapons of war.

cial conscience, partly on nationalistic ambition, already has a firm grip on European nations and appears to be tightening around the United States. And that era does not appear to hold the brightest of promises for educational endowment from either public or private monetary appropriations.

"Education is the leading out of the individual into an efficient and fully integrated personality, at home comfortably with himself and with his fellows, and in the world in which he lives, equipped to make a living and to live a life while he makes his living and en rapport with the ultimate spiritual realities that lie back of the visible phenomena of the university."
