So should we all

Once an important influence in the trend of world affairs, the word of the Pope has become but a periodic wish that peace shall come to this earth.

Still the religious leader of scores of millions of this world's citizens, the pontiff has become powerless in this age that is being sucked of all moral standards and religious principles.

The ineffectiveness of Pius XII in his prayer for peace Saturday from Rome is not the fault of the church, nor the fault of the Pope. It may be the fault of the followers, but there are none who would decry believers in God for not sacrificing their lives by millions in the hope of bringing an eventual

No, the ineffectiveness of the religionists is the result of the failure of the few men, with iron-gloved control of European and Asiatic affairs recognize moral values. From the beginning, the premise that God amondary to man has been their rule. Fundamentally, we still do not that this premise will leave the resulting syllogism without fallacy.

In some parts of the world, notably, in the United States, the religious influence, although much weakened and hard-pressed to retain its place among those influences that control our total earthly life, is still fighting to hold the position it once held; it is still fighting to regain the prestige and influence it may have lost when it became too intermingled with the political nature of

The hope of the world may well repose in the ability that we as moral beings may yet recognize the undefineable, yet comforting influence of a religion. Wherever that right to worship has been preserved must live the root of the rebuilding of faith; and that is in our own country.

We are sorry for one thing. And that is that our words, even though they may fall on open ears, are not possessed of a volume that would spread them to every corner of the world. We are sorry that those influences which work under the guise of "observer" do not turn their efforts toward rebuilding faith and spiritual belief, instead of devoting so much wasted time and effort to complicating the gory mess that this world is

But we, too, are caught in the maze. We, being powerless to bring about the slightest change in any group opinion or effort, must watch, yes, even cooperate, with regret, while we're pushed to the brink of destruction and nudity of soul. We're not preaching, nor are we pleading. While we have the right to pray as we please, a right that was so fundamental and so important in procuring us everything else we have, we are not using it, not considering it as something which might help us retain all else.

But Thanksgiving is over. Like so many others, we fear our words will be laughed at; but like few others, we don't mind.

If momentous happenings continue transpiring we'll run out of type and tax your time terrifically . we could expend your eyesight on turkey trotting and Thanksgiving notes but everybody had a good time and if they didn't who wants to hear about it . . . we, personally, abhor turkey hash...

We're real happy to be back ... everything will be lovely with us as long as people like Ann Green will continue her quaint habit of accepting dates with a couple of guys from peachy houses and then, working herself up to a frenzy, palming one of the unsuspecting lads off to a gal friend . .

Bob Sandberg of the Alpha Tau Omegas is an unstable date . . . but explainably so . . . it seems that even when the fellow is dated up business has a nasty way of interfering and the date has to be broken . . . and if the gal doubts Honest Bob's excuses, she can switch on the local airwaves and listen to his voice, announcing the hour, etc. .

After the Niemann-Severa bombshell we're about ready to start a contest for the lads and lasses who have been married sort of secretly for a spell . . .

War has, in general, harmed architecture, he said, while it has been an aid to certain other professions, such as surgery and law. War often destroys the entire life work of one engaged in the field of architecture.

Aid in war.

Architecture has long been used as an aid in war, mainly defensively. In modern times, it is used in the construction of air locks in houses in England, which prevent spreading of poison gases, and in bombproofed shelters.

Improved architectural defense has been largely responsible for the greatly-increased difficulties of bombing. Over one ton of German bombs, on the average, will now be required to kill one Englishman, whereas, in the last war, it would kill ten. Among the most interesting of slides shown was one taken from an old water-color drawing by Adolf Hitler, whose talent was not so great as his ambitions. The drawing is from an old sketch book and has never been published in Germany.
