Senning describes changes crisis has brought to teaching

. . . political science

"The present world crisis has changed the acceptable teaching methods in the political science department," according to Prof. J. P. Senning in an interview on teaching methods in the political science department. He added that professors used to be restricted but now they are urged to teach democracy.

Senning is of the opinion that the present world crisis has imposed a very real and vital problem on the teachers of political science. Unrelated though they may seem, it may be seen on closer investigation that there is a definite correlation between the two. "It is undoubtedly true," he said, "that there have been certain restrictions placed upon political science teachers in the past. Through fear of reprisal they have not taught that the government is a co-operative enterprise designed to enable groups to do what they could not do as individuals. "We would have been stepped on had we taught that, and now we are in a quandary," says Mr. Senning.

The same individuals who would have such teaching suppressed are howling for the same teachers to teach democracy and our government as it actually is. "In reality," says Mr. Senning, "they have no idea what democracy is."

New African mammal skulls appear in Morrill collection

How's your vocabulary? What's a bongo, a gerenuk, a gnu, a hartebeeste, an impalla, a kudu, a oribi or a topi?

These are not new words of a new language, but the names of some of the modern African mammals whose skulls have just been received from New York by the museum for its new comparative collection.

Nearly half of the specimens in the collection are from the famous Adam Breede trophy collection.

Business in Nebraska fails to make usual seasonal gain

According to the February issue of the business index published by Prof. W. A. Spurr of the college of business administration, Nebraska's business activity failed to make the usual seasonal gains in February over January as checked by the record of check transactions, building operations, post office business, department store sales and farm prices.

The state's business, however, continues well above its level of a year ago. The building industry leads, with February volume 17 percent above a year ago, while bank debits—a measure of the value of all business payments—are running 11 percent above last year.

Rosenlof article appears in education journal

G. W. Rosenlof, registrar, has recently had an article, "Were I a Dean" accepted for publication by the Journal of Higher Education. The article, which concerns a man's viewpoint as to what he would do were he a dean of women, will appear in April.

Tickets for students are 25 cents and are on sale at Walt's Music Store and the YMCA.

Schultz shows movies in western Nebraska

C. Bertrand Schultz, assistant director of the university museum, showed colored movies of the museum's field work to audiences in Oshkosh, Broadwater, and Bridgeport March 13, 14, and 15. While in the western part of the state, he is also visiting the two museum parties which have been working there all winter.

which was formerly stored in New York but which is now entirely housed at the university museum.

Buffalo skulls.

Among the 50 skulls in the shipment are some well-known animals including the buffalo, giraffe, zebra, jackal, baboon. Asiatic forms include the black-buck, Tibetan antelope and Przewalski's gazelle.

The new specimen will ultimately be displayed in a special skull and bone exhibit, and some of the examples will be used for comparative purposes in paleontology classes, C. Bertrand Schultz assistant museum director, said.

The Nebraska region of North America is the origin of many of the animals from the Old World, according to Schultz, and study is made of the relationships between the various groups of animals by a careful comparison of the bone.

World wide collection.

Eventually, the museum plans to have a world-wide collection although the emphasis will remain on Nebraska specimens and animals related to them.

Already, a collection of North American modern animal skulls has been built up at the museum during the last few years for comparative research work, and it now contains more than 1,800 specimens stored in a special room.

Capitol Personalities

WILLIAM J. NORMAN.

A member of the fourth estate is Senator William J. Norman. He has been in the newspaper business in Omaha for 26 years and now publishes two weekly papers.

One of Omaha's seven legislators, Senator Norman is in his second term as a representative of Douglas county, fourth district.

"I want to help the schools of the state all I can; I am vitally interested in seeing that Nebraska children get a good education. That is my principal purpose in the legislature." The above statement of Senator Norman is substantiated by a bill he introduced—L. B. 332. The measure embodies a school employes' retirement plan.

Probably most controversial of the bills the senator has proposed is L. B. 333. Under that act the state would be required to give preference to Nebraska products and labor in letting bids—providing the Nebraska bid is no more than five percent higher than the out of state bid.

Senator Norman is a member of the appropriations committee and of the special committee on intergovernmental co-operation.

will be "American Art" and the program is open to the public.

One of the painters largely responsible for the recent growth of native art in this country, Benton appears here through the cooperation of the convocations committee, the Nebraska Art association, and the Union.

He studied in Paris and New York after which he returned to his native Missouri where he developed a distinctive style of painting American themes.

Utley speaks.

Other speakers who have been selected for future convocations include Clifton Utley, director of the Chicago council on foreign relations who will speak here on March 28. He will speak on "American Leadership."

Prof. R. B. Mowat, professor of history at the University of Bristol in England, will discuss "The Strategy of War" at a convocation April 18. Both of these convocations will be held in the temple theater and are open to the public.
