White Space

By Elmer Sprague

While we were riding home on the bus last evening, our reading was interrupted by a scholarly gentleman of the faculty who wanted to know what erudite work of philosophy we were pursuing. We assured him that we were not reading philosophy at all, but some harmless paraphrases of Catullus' song on his sparrow.

"Have you decided whether Catullus' bird is a sparrow or a bullfinch?" the scholarly gentleman asked.

"It's a sparrow isn't it, sir?" we asked.

"I don't know," he answered. "I've read many learned papers arguing one way or the other. But the question reminds me of the first joke I ever heard in a minstrel show: Mr. Bones stepped up to the interlocutor, and said, 'Mr. Interlocutor, which is the worst worms or sparrows?' The interlocutor thought for awhile and finally said, 'Sparrows I guess. What would you say, Mr. Bones?' Mr. Bones smiled, showing all of his white teeth, and said, 'I don't know, Mr. Interlocutor, I never had sparrows.'"

Every branch of the Armed Services uses the telephone. One of a series, Anti-Aircraft.

To his mother and dad it seems only yesterday that he was using the family telephone to call his high school sweetheart. But today the orders he sends and receives over his wartime telephone help speed the day when love and laughter, peace and progress shall again rule the world.
