Coeds Borrow Endlessly ... Yells Rouse Dorm

By Barbara Kitchel.

"Who's got a pair of red shoes?" This query, or a reasonable facsimile, is a standard outlet for potential lung energy around "the dorm." Borrowing is as much a part of college life as the irritating alarm clock or the well-meaning but rarely appreciated chem text. However successful you were at home in guarding your anklets and hairpins from the kid sister's prying hands, you've got to face it—it can't go on!

One of the first things you learn after you give up your independence and privacy and start receiving letters addressed 540 North 16th Street is that you have no right to call anything your very own.

Probably the best method to follow, when you feel desirous of acquiring some article you are not fortunate (?) enough to possess yourself, is to follow these directions: go to the end of the hall, brace yourself against the wall or any other substantial medium that happens to be available, open your mouth—and YELL. Put all you've got back of the shout, because, of course, every room on the floor will be interested in hearing of your needs.

One Yell, Two Floors.

By ascending the landing between floors you can notify two floors at once, and some richly endowed individuals have the distinction of making themselves heard all over the building. Another effective plan, if the first fails to produce gratifying results, is to gallop noisily up and down the halls, chanting the article in question in a loud, monotonous tone. Of course neither of these practices is indulged in during quiet hours, (it says here.)

The variety of borrowable items is unlimited. Anything from the boy friend's latest picture to your prized silver fox jacket is subject to demand. Jewelry, magazines, hair ribbons, ashtrays become public property—by the end of the first six weeks, you can't remember which originally belonged to you, and which Mary Smith, over in Raymond, brought along with her.

Gain Confidence.

Some girls are bashful at first; I knew one whose voice actually quavered when she stumbled into my room in September to borrow a match. Today the same woman marched in and announced that she was wearing my brown hat for a dinner date tonight. It's a daily occurrence when some strange lass walks into the room and asks to borrow your—well, practically anything you own.

Not that they always bother to ask. Seeing a remote acquaintance at a party one night, I commented that I approved of her sweater, since I had one almost like it. She glanced distastefully at me and didn't bother to reply. A careful scan of my bureau drawer at home revealed that the sweater not only resembled mine, it was mine! And I couldn't judge too harshly; she'd probably forgotten from whom she had borrowed it.

This regular turnover in wearing apparel can sometimes prove embarrassing. One soldier's dream girl looked simply ravishing in her distinctive blue date dress. He vowed never to forget her and always to associate that particular shade of blue with her and their dates. Came the bust-up, and the soldier, after spending six lonely nights in the field house reconciling himself, decided to date that cute blonde he saw coming out of sosh. He called for her that night, ready to go out and have a good time, all memories of last week's romance gone. The door opened, and Blondie appeared, resplendent and smiling in the same blue dress. (They finally got the gun away from him...)

What if your best black formal does come back splattered with coke stains—what if your roommate does lose the set out of your diamond ring? Material things such as these are little enough to sacrifice for the sake of a beautiful friendship. Besides, that girl down the hall has a jacket that would look simply stunning with that skirt I borrowed three weeks ago from what's her name.
