Style-Conscious Coeds Go All-Out for Winter

BY ELEANOR KNOLL.

Bundled up like Baby Buntings, instead of just "babes," the coeds met the first winter weather of the year with every sort of scarf, bandanna, slack outfit, and pair of overshoes they could find in the back of those much-too-full-already closets.

Thinking more of warmth than strictly feminine fashions, coeds appeared in slacks, woolen ones or plaid ones, cotton or rayon, and even, here and there, a pair of jeans. A few brave souls endangered their precious possessions by wearing the usual anklets. One slack-wearer seeing herself bemused, "I'm going to diet, right now!" Marcia Woodruff beat all other plans with the prettiest pair of knee-socks, blue and gray plaid. Coeds, always conscious of style, matched sweaters with slacks, or white or loud plaid shirts with he-man pants to appear casual but smooth, in other words, the I-just-happened-to-have-this-nasty-old-outfit - which I - haven't - worn-in-public appearance.

Coeds Get Cold Feet.

From back in many closets, too, came overshoes, snowboots, and stadium boots which some fond mother, no doubt, insisted remain here regardless of apparent spring weather. Some poor little toesies, however, found themselves nipped by the cold when no big bungle-some, but dry, overshoes protected them. In other words, some coeds got cold feet, in more ways than one.

Among those whose strength seemed doubled by the "frosty" weather were Nancy Sutton, Shirley King, Sadie Hawkins, Demaris Morton, and Margaret Reese. The fair maidens held at range members of ATO and Beta in a battling, blood-thirsty, bust-up snowball fight.

A coed's diary might read at the end of such a day of snow like this: "Today it snowed. Lost one mitten; tore out my pre-war rubber boots; fell down in my new pair of wool slacks which I got last July; my hair's down; froze my toe; lost my head-scarf—Gee what a day!"

Labor Walkout At Minnesota U Stops Classes

Minnesota university was forced to cancel all civilian classes Friday due to the walkout of 500 striking university building service employees.

Army and navy classes carried on as usual though trainees were forced to help in the preparation of food.

The strike climaxed months of negotiation between employees and the school for a labor agreement and for recognition of a labor union as the board of regents prepared to go into executive sessions to discuss the situation, university officials reported that the walkout was nearly complete.

Ohio university at Athens is the oldest university west of the Alleghenies.

The first year women at Saint Mary of the Woods college, Indiana, are fourth generation freshmen at the college.
