Council Rejects Panhel Plan; Revokes Recognition of Parties

The political unrest which has been smoldering on the campus since spring elections, burst forth in full flame Wednesday when the student council, meeting for the last time this semester, revoked recognition of Barb and Union parties. Since these have been the only parties with council recognition, Wednesday's action theoretically leaves the university with no organized political groups.

The question of campus politics and elections was raised when Dorothy Carnahan, AWS president, presented for council consideration a resolution, passed by the Panhellenic council of presidents, calling for an open primary to precede each university election and the elimination of party designation following candidates' names on the ballot. The purpose of the proposed change, according to the Panhellenic representative, is to promote the election of students "because of policy, not because of social affiliation." She also stated that it was obvious that the recent spring election "was not up to par," drawing from Lois Christie, council president, the query, "You mean the election was not up to par according to the Spectator, don't you?"

Lost in Shuffle.

The Panhellenic-sponsored resolution was quickly lost in the shuffle when a bloc of council members, led by Jean Larson, newly masked Mortar board president, and Pat Cole, chairman of the constitutions committee, presented a resolution that the council revoke its recognition of both barb and union parties in an attempt to completely eliminate party politics from the campus. The new Mortar Board prexy stated that the present campus political system encourages election of candidates on the basis of "social monetary standing rather than merit." Pat Cole, who has been active in university politics, advocated closer co-operation between Barbs and Greeks in the election of students best qualified to direct university activities.

First passed by a voice vote, the resolution revoking party recognition passed again when a show of hands was called for. No reason was given for the council's action other than the general decla-

Professor McNeill gave a talk on "How to Spot An Apple-Polisher." Sadie Hawkins responded with "How to Apple-Polish." Professor Kirshman talked on "What a Professor Does in the Summer," and Dorothea Lemon answered with "What a Student Does in the Summer." The banquet was in charge of Mary Lou Holtz.

Herbert Norman Serves as Prexy For Palladian

ration that the move would "clean up" campus politics. Party platforms, filed with the council in 1939, drew no attention.

Must Recognize Parties.

Lois Christie, retiring council president, emphasized that next year's council may recognize any newly formed political party which files for recognition and presents a suitable platform. Harold Andersen, newly elected president of the 1944-45 council, declared, "The university needs a workable, practical plan for clarification of the whole issue of politics. The council next year will be glad to consider any such plan to clear up the present confused picture."

New Student Union board members, Janice Campbell, Virginia Stuermer, Mildred Bauer, Mildred Engstrom and Lois Opper were accepted by the council. The group also approved the Coed Counselor constitution as amended recently. Pat Cole announced that the additions to the AUF constitution had not been completed and that coun-

UN Summer Session Offers Librarian, Teacher Courses

Special workshops for librarians, superintendents, and teachers will be offered in addition to the regular summer school courses. R. D. Moritz, dean of summer school, announced today. Registration will be May 31 at the coliseum and classes will begin June 1.

Dean Moritz said that a tentative program had been set up for engineers who would be deferred after June 1. This would enable these men to secure additional hours and for some, enough hours for graduation, he added. Courses in electrical, civil, architectural, and chemical engineering will be offered.

Workshops will include a three week course for state librarians. Requests for such a course have numbered 15. For superintendents of small schools, Dean Moritz said that a six weeks course in school problems and buildings will be offered because of the large percentage of inexperienced superintendents who have requested this training.

Includes Workshop.

In addition to these workshops a one week course for officers and members of executive boards of six districts of the Nebraska State Teachers association in development of better public relations and building up committee activities will be included.
