Engineering College Improves Study Course to Help Students

In order to equip its graduates with a greater administrative capacity, the University's Engineering college is revising its course of study for the purpose of improving the technical proficiency of the department, Dean Roy M. Green stated yesterday.

The revision is based on faculty research and a recently completed survey of a hand-picked group of 144 nationally prominent engineers. The majority of the engineers said these were the non-technical courses they needed most and didn't get enough of in college; English composition, public speaking, business law, personnel, labor relations and economics, listed in that order of importance.

Technical Courses.

In technical courses, the men stated, their professional experiences revealed these as most valuable: physics, algebra, trigonometry, engineering, drawing, and mechanics of materials.

Dean Green said the revised course of study would emphasize particularly these ten subjects; (1) a graduate engineer must not only be well grounded in professional training but must also be able to transmit his knowledge either in written reports or talks; and (2) that engineering careers vary greatly, as does the profession itself, demonstrating the need for a graduate to have a well-rounded basic knowledge of physics, mathematics and material upon which to build his technical training through actual practical practice in the field.

No Longer Technical.

The questionnaire, Dean Green said, demonstrates too that engineers are no longer an exclusively "high top boot and woolen shirt" profession devoted entirely to technical matters.

The dean declared, "Today's engineers must not only be a technician, but an able administrator. He must also possess a working knowledge of the society in which he lives because his work now is related to so many social and economic phases of our society. He must be a useful, informed citizen to perform his job competently. We hope to achieve this end by giving students a broader base upon which to pyramid their professional experiment."

The contemplated revision here would assist the engineer in meeting problems now common to engineers such as; appraising the economic worth of engineering works; organizing effectively individuals employed on engineering jobs; explain engineering projects to the public and a readiness to give intelligent service in the improvement of home, church, school and state.
