

Telescope Saves Day as Spots On Sun Confuse Astronomers

"Spots on the Sun" isn't the title of a new jukebox lyric but it may be if old Sol doesn't start washing his face more often.

Prof. Collins and the astronomy class were quite impressed with the telescopic view of the sun yesterday and before any of his bewildered classes, after discovering the large dark object covering part of the sun, could make any more deductions like the one above, Prof. Collins hastened to explain.

Disillusionment.

The following dissertation may disillusion some of the more romantic readers, so prepare! The sun is not made of Apollo's reflections as many have always believed. Nope, according to Prof. Collins the sun is a mass of brilliant, swirling liquid.

When some mean old atmospheric gas comes whipping up, the liquid starts swirling faster and faster and as it whirls it becomes cold and appears black. Hence; spots on the sun. Fun, ain't it?

Anyone can witness this phenomena by stopping in at the observatory on Ninth and S street, Prof. Collins stated.
