In Your Hands...

In a world gone money-mad, anyone who asks for a dollar or two is eyed with deep suspicion and told how hard it was to get that dollar. Full of optimism, we look for the day when sympathetic help in time of need and the willingness to extend that help are the prime objective in life. Whether or not that time ever comes for the world in general, one organization carries on that program right now... the Red Cross.

Red Cross workers are asking for contributions now, when citizens are taking a firmer grasp on their pocket-books and they have a tough job. They are asking university students, too, even the campusites seem to consider themselves immune from everything that happens more than one block away from 14th street.

There are 10,000 of us attending classes at Nebraska. The goal for the university Red Cross drive is $1,800, or an average contribution of 18c per student. Yet, on the fifth day of the eight day campaign, less than $200 has been donated by individuals. Ag campus students are more responsive to the appeal than city campus students, by the way.

You can read lists of the services Red Cross offers to those who need them; you can talk to GI's who spent hours in Red Cross clubs overseas and thankfully ate the doughnuts and coffee from Red Cross canteens; you can hear about the Red Cross in movie theaters showing such pictures as "The Lady in the Lake," "Perils of Pauline," and "Lost Honeymoon;" you can and will meet people in every section of the country aided by the Red Cross... but will you contribute?

To date, the answer has been "No." We could write for pages, giving reasons why you should change the answer to "Yes." Instead, we'll merely point out the booth located in the lobby of the Union for Lincoln students not contacted otherwise, and the fact that solicitors have been appointed for all organized houses on the campus, and leave it in your hands.
