Arnold Stresses U.S. Role In International Economy

Reiterates Belief In UN's Failure

"Our commitments in foreign countries should be looked upon as investments," Thurman Arnold, chief trust buster in Roosevelt's administration, told students at a general convocation Monday afternoon in the Union ballroom. Pointing out that no other nation could be compared with this country, Arnold spoke of Russia as a land where "20 million are starving. How could she compete with our exports?"

After reiterating his belief that the United Nations Organization was doomed to failure "because there is no power in small, independent nations," Arnold said that he believed world pressure would force us to accept our obligations in Greece.

Responsibility.

"I hesitate to undertake the responsibility for the world," he said, "but I believe we will be forced to do so." He explained that the smaller nations had Great Britain as their bulwark, and with the collapse of the British Empire, that bulwark was wiped away.

It was in this background that Arnold set forth his belief that our foreign commitments should be considered as investments. In order to have an expanding economy we must be able to invest abroad, to make goods, and take those which the other nations can produce.

This he elaborated by showing that a healthy world economy would need to be free from restraints to trade, and that a healthy national economy would need the same freedom. This is what his anti-trust division sought to accomplish by the numerous anti-monopoly suits of the past decade.
