

UN Research Turns Toward Science Coop

"The University's Research program will show an increasing tendency toward a co-operative attack on particular problems by interested scientists from various fields on the university staff", said Chancellor Gustavson at a meeting of the Nebraska Pharmaceutical association Tuesday afternoon.

"We hope," he continued, this program will be greatly implemented by an increasing degree of co-operation between the university and the people of Nebraska."

"The great advances in science have resulted from co-operative research," said Dr. Gustavson, and added that history reveals scientists once isolated themselves and worked alone. But as the world became smaller, as communication and transportation improved, an increasing amount of co-operation between scientists resulted.

"This thread of communication between the world's scientists has produced many of our great discoveries. It was broken by the first world war, and again by the second. But after each war the thread is slowly knitted together and true scientific achievement results."
