

A Thought by Beverly Sievers

It is an awesome experience to stand at the end of a telescope and gaze far out into space, realizing, for the first time, the minute place which earth assumes in this whole system of whirling planets.

When this fact has struck home, it is but a matter of minutes before one begins to question his own relative place and importance in the world. It is an ego-shaking thought to entertain for very long.

We are concerned with the affairs which are important to us: Whether or not the professor who has it "in for us" is going to pick on us again today, if "she" will give us a break and not be busy Friday night or if "he" will ask us for a date after the hour dance. Surely in a university of 10,000 students no professor could take time to single out one special student and pick on him, and, no doubt, the "he" or "she" of today will be replaced by someone new in three or four weeks.

We become entangled in our own problems and therefore are not free to assume a responsible place in this complete system of ours.

Every beginning is small. See if your country had been ravaged by some one else for five minutes; preferably some one who has a different code of ethics, a different color of skin or a different religious faith.

Would you be above stealing food if you were starving because the wages you were paid were insufficient to buy it, or aged by war and it was "every man for himself. What would be your reaction to a taxi door slammed in your face because some one refused to ride with "a damned Jap?"

If you can successfully feel and sympathize with one of the emotions set up by this sort of situation, you have made the first step in filling your place in the universe.
