Singers Give Brahms's 'Requiem' In Palm Sunday Performance

BY SAM WARREN.

"Truly memorable" is an inadequate way to describe the performance by the University Singers of Brahms's "Requiem," Sunday at First-Plymouth Congregational church. Under the direction of the conductor, Dr. Arthur E. Westbrook, the 120 singers with Myron Roberts at the organ, gave to the glorious choral work a moving and highly professional reading which the audience filling the sanctuary and balcony of the church will not forget.

The choral work was notable for its accuracy and precision of phrasing, for the sectional alertness and precision within the choir carefully-drawn tonal shadings that ranged from a quiet resignation in the second portion, "Behold, all flesh is as the grass," to the unbounded exultation of the closing sentence, "Grave where is they triumph? Death, O where is thy sting?"

Inspirational Effect.

This tremendous, fortissimo climax of full chorus and organ terminated a Palm Sunday performance that will probably be unequalled in any Lincoln musical service during Holy Week for spiritual and emotional inspiration. The University Singers appear each year in opera, concert and memorial services to university personnel, in addition to Christmas and spring oratorios as the core of the Choral Union, but it is doubtful if any performance by the Singers this year will equal the musical emotional impact of the "Requiem" performance Sunday.

It appeared that drawing an effective performance from the chorus was no work for its director, Arthur Westbrook. But the ease and absence of gesticulating conductor's mannerisms belied the hours of intense rehearsal and masterly directive insight which such a sterling performance demands. The same Westbrook skill which gives new life year after year to the traditional "Messiah"
