

Ivy Tradition . . .

Classroom routine comes to a halt Thursday when the University gives a day to the furthering of that elusive quality known as tradition. Ivy Day furnishes a large part of the tradition at the University of Nebraska.

Innocents, Mortar Boards, interfraternity and intersorority sings, the Ivy Day oration and the Ivy Day poem, the May Queen and her court, the Daisy Chain and the Ivy Chain, all of these ingredients blend together on a day which finds students deserting their books to observe and participate in activities dating back to the turn of the century.

Ivy Day is one of the occasions we will remember about our school days. It is an event which will stand out in recollections of the past in future years. The tradition it embodies constitutes an important factor in school spirit, in the warm feeling of pride that Nebraska graduates rekindle when thinking of the alma mater during their days as alums.

Ivy Day provides an opportunity for the university to put on a show of pageantry for its students and for the crowds of parents and friends who visit the campus.

Engineer's Week and the Farmers' Fair coincide with Ivy Day this year and add more color to the weekend. These events too are a part of the tradition of the university and deserve niches of their own in any enumeration of the outstanding happenings of the school year.

Give tradition its due. It seldom ventures from the shadows, but when it does, it deserves the spotlight.
