We Came—We Saw . . .

What is it like to be a high school student on a university campus during a journalism convention?

Well, it's swell. At first you're all mixed up because you don't know many people or where to go or when to do the right thing. But then other delegates are facing the same problems.

"Chewing the rag" with other students during panel discussions is fun and you even learn something new to try out on your school paper.

Then your sponsor tells you that you will represent the home town publication on the "Daily Nebraskan." Staff members tell you to write a news story or a feature or an editorial and they forget to mention the subject matter.

But leaving the noisy "Nebraskan" office, walking down the halls alone you think the "Rag" is a swell publication and you'd like to enroll in the School of Journalism here at the University of Nebraska when you graduate from high school.

This is the 17th annual convention of the association.

Attend Panel On Finances

BY DONNA FERGUSON and MARY KOTSIOPULOS, Kearney.

For the first series of panel discussions under "Financial Headaches of Newspapers," students from Utica, Fremont and Grand Island, including Miss Bessie Fischer, advisor from Lincoln, gave reports on the finances of their respective papers.

These students reported that they have financed their school papers with advertisements, circulation of papers and the assistance of their school boards.

Schools stated the differences in prices of advertisements per column inch and the number of issues printed throughout the year plus the price per issue.

After these special reports were given, discussion of financial difficulties were open to the entire class, allowing students to discuss the financial conditions of their school papers.

Welcome and Goodby . . .

This must be a welcome and a good-by all at once to the high school journalists who labored to put out today's "Special Edition" of The Daily Nebraskan.

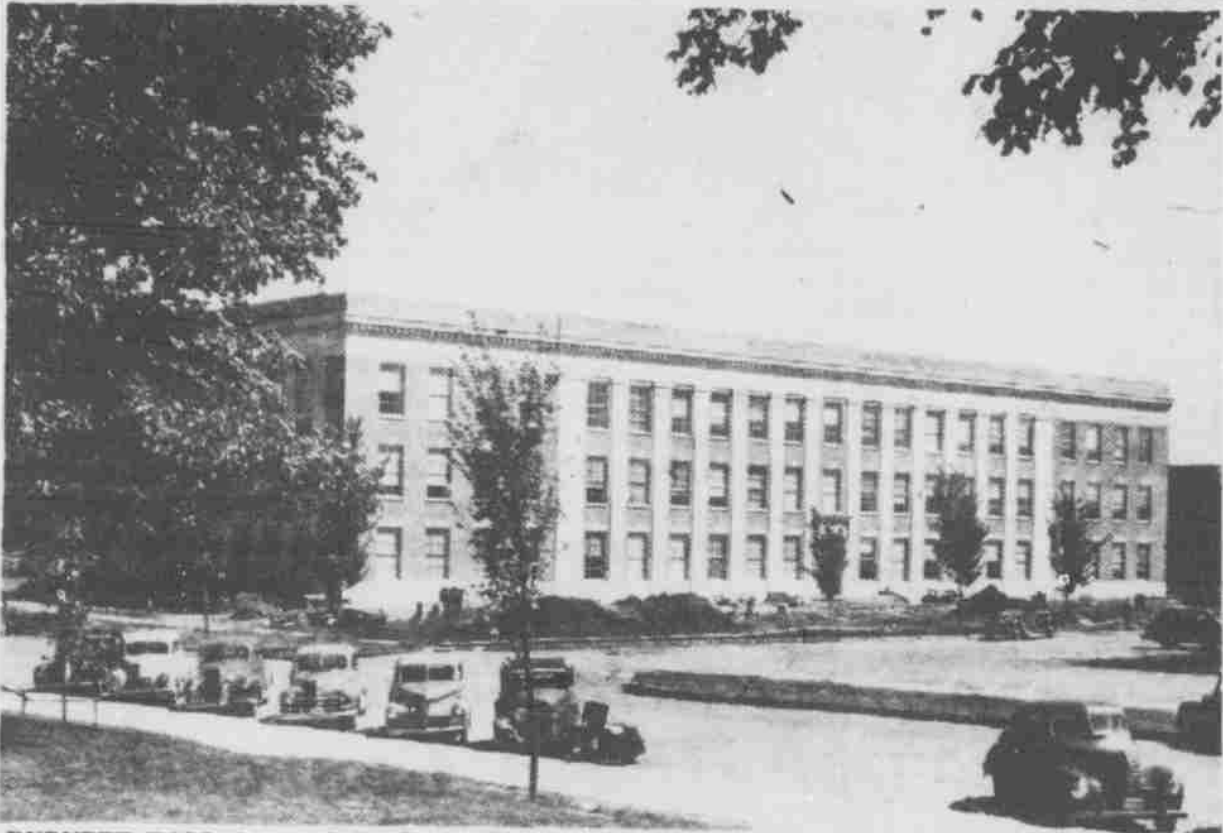

Daily Nebraskan staff members are always more than glad to co-operate with the school of journalism and the NHSPA convention which is held on Nebraska's campus annually. We hope that we have been able to contribute something constructive to both the convention and to individual high school writers.

You journalists are future Daily Nebraskan reporters, staff members and editors. We have tried to show you, in a small way, how our paper is operated and published. We hope that when you come back to the University of Nebraska as students you will come to The Daily Nebraskan office and help that staff put out a good newspaper. New reporters are always welcome and should feel at home in our office!

We are only sorry that we were not able to see all of the NHSPA delegates, but time, work, and space did not permit this. However, those of you who did not work on this edition are just as welcome at any time. When you come to the university, make The Daily Nebraskan your first and most regular stopping off place.

New Burnett Hall Houses NU School of Journalism

BURNETT HALL, home of the Journalism department, was constructed last year to accommodate an ever-increasing enrollment in the School of Journalism.

Because of increased enrollment in the School of Journalism in recent years, a new building, Burnett hall, was constructed last year, for the journalism department.

2 Classrooms Crowded

With the ever-increasing demand of prospective students to enter this division of the College of Arts and Sciences, the new building came as a relief from already overcrowded classrooms. With Burnett hall completed, the school continues to produce some of the finest graduates in this field.

Under the direction of Dr. William Swindler, the School of Journalism has developed every field of journalistic writing, including radio which has helped students interested in the "fourth estate." Modern equipment and an experienced faculty have given the student entering the School of Journalism an excellent opportunity to develop skills in the field of journalism, in both the editorial and advertising branches. Students receive training in all phases of news reporting from copy reading to the actual printing of a story.

Each year outstanding students in the School of Journalism are rewarded for their efforts. The Sigma Delta Chi Scholarship awards are presented to the highest 10 percent of the graduating class, including both majors in journalism and those taking certificates under the auspices of the national organization of Sigma Delta Chi, journalism honorary. The Sigma Delta Chi cup is given each semester for the best news story written by any student. Selection of the student is made by a committee composed of one alumnus, one student member and the faculty adviser. The Sigma Delta Chi feature award is given for the best feature story written by any student each semester.
