Damaged Books . . .

Nebraska University's Don L. Love Memorial library is one of America's most modern college libraries. The building was erected with a gift of $850,000 from the estate of Don L. Love, for many years a prominent Lincoln lawyer and banker, and twice mayor of the city.

It was completed in 1943, and, after its reconversion from wartime use as an ASTP barracks, $250,000 was spent in furnishing and equipping the building. It has space for more than 800,000 books and documents. Many large reading rooms provide space for more than 1,000 students under modern lighting conditions at spacious study tables.

It goes without saying that our library is certainly one of which we may be proud. But it takes more than just pride to keep the library, and its books, in good condition. Library officials report that a small minority of the students have been damaging books to the extent of tearing pages out of

The books in the library are purchased with tax money. So when students destroy them, they are only taking money from the pockets of their parents, friends and relatives. Of course, this is exaggerating the point a bit, but it's hardly fair to the people of Nebraska just to throw their money out the window. And it's not being considerate of the students to damage books or parts of books. Nothing can be more disgusting than to spend 30 minutes reading a reference book and then discover that the next five pages have Kenten and Tom Clark been torn out.

But enough of the preaching. If the small number of students who are responsible for damaging books will stop and consider the situation, it can be cleared up with very James Doyle, Pat Black and Bob little trouble.
