Try This on for Size . . .

It is becoming increasingly apparent that more ground work is necessary before a new student government is set up on the campus.

As the affair stands now, no one seems to know what to do or how to do it. The constitutional assembly is temporarily adjourned because it feels unable to draft any plans without a concrete policy regarding its powers from the Faculty Senate. Meanwhile, the Senate seems to be a quagmire of procrastination and distrust. The Senate seems to be afraid to put any power at all into any group attempting to draft a constitution for student government.

It is apparent that no student government plan will be approved by the Senate which gives such student government any real power. As is so often the case, the faculty and the administration will not trust the students with any real power to act on their own. If the faculty's attitude persists, the students might just as well forget about the whole plan. Whatever plans are drafted are sure to be scrutinized carefully by the Senate, and it is a safe bet that anything smacking of liberalism and independence from faculty ties will be scratched.

With things in this situation, we can hardly blame the interested students participating in the constitutional assembly for adjourning. As things are, there is little reason for the existence of a student government.

We also believe there is little reason for the existence of a faculty group which so copiously controls student government.

A plan has come to us which, we believe, merits thoughtful consideration. It calls for the junking of student government and the faculty controlling group and the subsequent establishment of an all-powerful group composed evenly of representatives of the administration, the faculty and the student body. True, this would not be a student body; still, it could do much more than any student government under the control of the faculty and it would give the students a much larger share in shaping their own policy.

Such a group could be given the responsibility of carrying on student government. They would control everything that the faculty or administration wants controlled, but it would also insure that the students had an active part in shaping policies.

In the midst of all these discussions, we keep hearing of a lack of student interest in student government. We also hear of a lack of faculty interest in student government. The faculty's "holier-than-thou" attitude in this respect is utter nonsense, and yet it plays a large part in their list of reasons for disbanding the old Student Council and for insisting on a tight hold in further constitutional deliberations.

Small and powerful groups from the administration, faculty and student body are the ones who are interested in a good and effective student government. Why, then, should not these small groups get together and form a strong, central group of student government? It is unfortunate that the students can do so little without faculty or administration sanction. If the students must have this sanction, why not let them get it from a group in which they are fairly and equally represented?

Y's Consider Problems of Married Life

What about the problems of marriage?

This was the topic of the YM-YW discussion held Wednesday night. Answering questions and acting as guest speakers were Paul Meadows, professor of a course in marriage, and Dr. Frank Bancroft, a pediatrician.

MEADOWS answered questions which had been submitted to him by YM and YW members. In answering the question of how best to prepare for marriage, he suggested that the length of courtship often will have some effect on a marriage. As he said, "the longer the courtship; the better the chance for the marriage." Meadows was very much opposed to the "fly-by-night" courtships.

He also said that the temperament and the similarity of two people are important for a sound marriage. He added that the statement "opposites attract" is not true.

DR. BANCROFT viewed the subject from the side of a pediatrician. He said that many problems with children are not due to the children but rather to their adults. He stressed that the broken home and the unhappy home often leads the child into trouble.
