Speech, Customs Barriers In Korea Reports New Military Instructor

"People are people; they are human beings wherever you go. We need to break down the barriers of language and custom and get at the man underneath." Major Earl W. Bihlmeyer believes that the barriers of language and custom are surmountable. Now associate professor of military science and tactics at the University, the Major returned from Korea in February where he served at the United Nations Reception Center of the U. S. 8th Army. And was military advisor to the Thailand battalion.

The Center was set up to process UN troops other than those of the United States or Republic of Korea. Troops received included those from Thailand, France, Netherlands, Belgium, Greece, British Columbia and Australia. An Indian Ambulance Corps and some Philippine contingents were also received. The mission of the center was to orientate the troops on the Korean topography and the way to supply them with equipment and arms and to furnish necessary training. Special types of training were requested by some of the troops. The barriers of language and customs did slow the procedure down somewhat, the major reported. Everything had to be done through interpreters for no American could speak any of the languages. Every detachment which the Center received had English speaking personnel, mostly officers who had studied English in institutions of higher education in their own countries. English seemed to be a required course in many of the countries. One of the outstanding examples of surmounting the language barrier occurred when the Thailand battalion, with which the Major served as military advisor, was moved into the lines to relieve the French battalion. The relief was conducted in three languages, French, German and Siamese. Some of the Thais knew a little French; some of the French knew a little German and some of the Thais knew a little German. The relief was conducted at night and the Chinese, the major believes, never knew that the exchange had been made although they were in position on a nearby ridge. Among the interesting problems handled by the center was that of diet. A majority of the troops had their own ideas about food—they preferred their own. The Thailanders desired rice as the bulk of their diet. The Turkish people do not eat pork. Rice had to be added to the rations of the Thailand troops and a special supplement to take the place of pork had to be prepared for the Turks. Many of these people are accustomed to highly seasoned food and the Center used a large amount of hot sauces and seasonings the major said. Difficulties sometimes arose in teaching the troops to use American equipment. For example, one unit brought three large pots to do their cooking in. Their idea of cooking in the field consisted of throwing all the food available into the pots and stirring it up with a stick. It took time to teach them the use of American gasoline field rations. Major Bihlmeyer has written an article, "Wartime Education in Korea," which will appear in a forthcoming issue of The School Executive. The magazine will be available in Love Memorial Library. The article was written from observations made by the Major while in Korea. He attended a field day, akin to those held by grade schools in America and visited the Ministry of Education as well as conferring with many school teachers and pupils. Major Bihlmeyer was recently awarded the Commendation Ribbon with Metal Pendant for meritorious service in Korea from Dec. 14, 1951 to Feb. 5, 1952. He previously was awarded the Bronze Star Medal for meritorious service as a member of the United Nations Reception Center.

NU Economists Predict Retail Prices To Remain Constant

University food economists believe that prices of food at retail will average approximately the same in 1953 as in 1952. Although they foresee a lessening of foreign demand for wheat and other exported food products, they say this will have little effect on retail food prices in the U. S. The supply of food will be nearly the same this fall and winter due to this year's good harvests and marketing of a large number of farm livestock, predict the economists. On one hand, they say that each person will eat more beef, veal, turkey, eggs, oranges, frozen fruits and vegetables and margarine than he ate last fall and winter. But, on the other hand, they forecast less consumption of pork butter, canned vegetables and tree nuts per person. Taking a look a little further into the future, the economists expect everyone will eat more beef, veal, chicken, margarine, frozen fruits, sweet potatoes and vegetables, both frozen and fresh, and will drink more frozen and canned fruit juices than eaten and drunk in 1952. Also, less pork, eggs, turkey and butter will be consumed per person. They conclude with the belief that marketing of meat animals and production of fruits and vegetables will be on the increase if the weather of next year is more normal than that of this year.
