A Strong Finish?

After a year's absence from the campus, the NUCWA Mock United Nations got off to a weak start yesterday afternoon. Out of 28 delegations scheduled to attend the UN sessions, only 16 were present...

day's meeting, was little short of a disaster. Ignorance of parliamentary procedure, on the part of the delegates, slowed up the conference to a great degree.

Actually, the only thing accomplished in the meeting yesterday was that it officially opened the Mock UN. By virtue of the small attendance, Dr. Seabury's speech and the election of a president may be given little credit as actual accomplishments.

It is recognized by the University that international affairs, past and present, should be important to students. Courses available and required in current events, 20th century history and political developments in the world today indicate this.

The lack of organization is not the entire fault of NUCWA but includes in the blame the student body which persists in a type of Mid-western isolationism embodied in its lack of interest for topics that have no bearing on social enjoyments or activity points.

For an organization attempting to promote knowledge and practical application of that knowledge—a noble ideal indeed—NUCWA has consistently borne the brunt of student indifference.

Indifference has taken the form of irresponsibility in that students accepting a position as a delegate to the UN conference fail to show up, thus lessening the effectiveness of the conference even more than it already is from lack of general student attendance.

NUCWA can do no more than plan the conference, call for volunteers to fill delegations, set up the mechanics for procedure and hope that the student will follow through.

The next two days will probably see an uneventful NUCWA conference with a very few students attending and even fewer getting anything out of the conference.

Members of the City Campus and Ag Religious Councils have planned special services for Sunday. A few students who believe in the principle of prayer and who wish to give visible support to it will attend.

Centuries Of Prayer

The Universal Day of Prayer again will be observed around the world Sunday. Since, however, days are set aside first for this and then for that, Sunday will probably pass by as something akin to Groundhog Day.

a reminder of things of which one often needs to be reminded.

Who, Us?

To those cynical students who have been thinking that students of today are losing their grip, a note of encouragement came from the ranks of University instructors.

By no means does this indicate that the campus is disinterested and that the Universal Day of Prayer is observed only by a discouraging few.

What's New In NU Colleges Dental College Adds Course, Expands Laboratory Facilities

Recently the College of Dentistry has made additions and alterations which have broadened the opportunities offered by the college, and increased the efficiency in teaching.

Three new dental units, also in the jade-green tone, in the diagnosis clinic add to the efficiency in oral examinations.

Daunted Love Drives Lazy Lout To Work

I have a rather tragic story to tell you today. It is about a young man who went to college, found and lost love and came to a sordid end. The hero of my story is Theophrastus. Such a young fellow whose personality I always found engaging, though some people were inclined to consider him rather shiftless. I will relate his story from the beginning.

Campus Preview 'Far Country' Typifies Cowboy-Villain Routine

By ELLIE GULLIANT I saw "The Far Country" yesterday. It starred James Stewart, Ruth Roman and Corinne Calvet. I remember having seen this same story many times before — with different scenery, different actors, different titles, but the self-same, hackneyed plot.

Hortense 'n Gertrude Vastly Ghastly If Canyon Goes

Editor's note: Mary Shelley and Janet Gordon, new Nebraska columnists are both natives in the College of Arts and Sciences. "Hortense, you see the paper this morning?" "Sure. I read Pogo."
