Teaching Standards Lowest In Nebraska

More than 60 per cent of secondary teachers graduated from the University and 71 per cent from the elementary level go immediately into teaching positions, said Wesley Meierhenry, chairman of the department of educational services.

These statistics are above the national level of 55 per cent of secondary education graduates and 65 per cent elementary graduates going into the profession.

In the United States, colleges and universities graduate about the same number of teachers that are needed but military service and homemaking cut down the number of graduates that go directly into the profession.

Teacher certification in Nebraska at present is the lowest in the nation. A high school graduate can teach in a rural school and in small communities a person can teach with only one year of college.

This present standard, however, is being raised. In 1960 a minimum of two years of college will be required to get a temporary certificate in Nebraska.

Last year 6,612 requests for teachers were filed with the Teacher Placement Division.
