ROTC Officers: Council To Investigate Army 'Pressure Tactics'

Discussion was raised in the Student Council meeting Wednesday on senior Army ROTC students' attending the 1955 Military Ball.

Marvin Breslow, CCRC representative, suggested the Council investigate any pressure put on students regarding their attendance at the Ball.

Breslow said the Council has authority to investigate such a matter, as indicated in their action in investigating the Candidate Officers' Association last fall.

A proposed conference of the student governments in Big Seven schools in Kansas City from Dec. 27 to 30, was discussed. John Fagan, Sam Van Pelt, Andy Hove, Dick Reische and Marvin Breslow were free to attend.

Gail Katskee, chairman of the student activities committee, reported that the possibility for more student participation in University government had been discussed. The committee hopes to formulate some action at a future time, she said.

Sue Simmons presented the purpose of the foreign student committee of NUCWA as organizing the activities of foreign students. Present action of the committee concerns placing foreign students in Lincoln homes for Christmas dinner.

Faculty-Graduate Club will hold its annual Christmas Party Friday during its regular coffee hour from 4 p.m. to 7 p.m. There will be entertainment and refreshments.

All faculty and graduate students are cordially invited to attend.

Lambert Address: U.S. Must Know Facts About Russian Progress

It is highly important that the United States knows what is going on in Russia. W. V. Lambert, Dean of the College of Agriculture, said in an address at the Ag College Wednesday.

"The Russians are looking to the future," he said. The Russians are good scientists, and are making progress in agriculture and other fields, he added.

If the United States is to maintain its position of leadership we must look to Russia and compare that country with our own, Lambert said.

"We are well ahead of them in most fields," he added. Lambert said that Russian agriculture is presently organized on about 89,000 collective farms which operate 83 per cent of the arable land. Forty-five per cent of the Russian population lives on these collective farms.

Each one of the farms is a Communist enterprise, Lambert said. The wages of the farmers depend on the size of the crop. Wages vary between $150 and $225 dollars a month, he said, but prices are very high.

Some of the inflationary prices include fat salt pork, $4.10 a pound; eggs, 25 cents each; cotton dresses, $75 to $125.

Living standards in Russia are low because of the scarcity of consumer goods, Lambert said. Most of the high industrial capacity the Russians boast about is going into military production, he said.

The Russians have also stepped up education, Dean Lambert said. Education begins in government nursery schools, since so many Russian women work. About half of the Russian labor force is made up of women, he added.

"Russian school training is much more narrow than ours," he said. Most of the training is scientific, Lambert said, and is very specialized.

"The Russian people are very curious to know how we are living in America," he said. The ordinary citizens were eager to tell the visiting Americans that the Russian people want peace, he said. "I thought they were sincere," Lambert added.

The movie shown in conjunction with the Dean's speech pointed out various aspects of Russian agriculture, including collective farms, new farm machinery and new farming methods.

The movie pointed out that Russia has progressed farther than the United States expected in wheat production, agriculture research and the rapid improvement in the use of machinery.

Agricultural progress in the U.S.-R compares with that in the United States, the movie indicated. Right now the Russians are 20 to 25 years behind the United States.
