Ivy Day, Field Day:

School Tradition Prevails

By BILL ROSS
Nebraska Reporter

The arrival of spring always stimulates a special sentimentality in the hearts of some of the more devoted students and alumni. It is the time when school tradition is most prevalent.

Some traditions are still observed and practiced while others have faded away.

Most of these traditions such as Ivy Day, the tackling of the Innocents, the masking of Mortar Boards, the crowning of the May Queen, are well known and originated long before even the most senior members of the faculty can remember.

Dr. G. W. Rosenlof, Dean of Admissions, said that Ivy Day was here when he came to the University over thirty years ago.

Dean Rosenlof also pointed out that the gates and the columns have historical significance.

The gates were first used when the University campus was small enough to be completely enclosed by a high iron fence. The gates were locked at a certain time each night and reopened in the morning. Evidently, the women's residences were also within the enclosure.

As the campus grew the enclosure became too small and the fences had to be torn down. The fence now encloses Wyuka cemetery on east O street. The gates however, were lost and recently turned up in a scrap pile on Ag campus. Since then they have been reconitioned, installed, and dedicated to the University.

There are some events that are not regarded as traditional but which were practically born with the University.

In 1887, the Hesperian Student, which was the student publication of that time, planned a "great field day" which was a combination of All-Sports Day and Spring Day.

The "Field Day" was to consist of the overture by the cadet band, dress parade of the battalion, contest drill by volunteer squads, football game, Crete vs. University eleven, wheelbarrow race, sack race, barrel race, throwing contest, wrestling and boxing, running race, women's screaming match, and a baseball game between Kansas State and the University.

According to the Hesperian Student much of the elaborate program failed to materialize but nevertheless the Field Day was held.

Among the prizes awarded were a Dunlap hat for the winner of the 100-yard dash, a copy of Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies to go to the winner of the wheelbarrow race and complete works for the best wrestler. No one entered the jumps when they found there were no prizes for the winners.

Naturally, there were also many customs and fads that did not evolve into tradition as this excerpt from the Hesperian points out.

"Tobacco chewing was not uncommon. Nearly all the walls of University Hall (the first building on campus where all classes were held) were frescoed with tobacco juice.

Although the W.C.T.U. petitions relating to the use of tobacco were unfounded in 1887, the Board of Regents prohibited smoking on campus and in buildings in 1899.

At the first faculty meeting in 1871, the professors decreed that ten unexcused absences from class meant a student's suspension.

According to regulations, each student had an assigned seat in chapel. Attendance at devotional exercises was compulsory, as was church attendance on Sunday.

Obviously, all of the rulings have not survived as tradition.

But from the Hesperian we find that student behavior — traditional on all campuses — was essentially the same then as it is now, although perhaps more poetically described.

"The students were not much different at the turn of the century than those who attended the University during the seventies.

Romance was always present and the University steps were a Mecca where hours were whiled away with bright and witty remarks — sometimes under a shawl."
