

Film Head Says Use Increasing

The president of the largest organization in the classroom teaching films field foresees an increased "darkening" of classrooms all over the nation.

He said as a result of a quarter-century of pioneering, educational films have now become a fully accepted teaching tool everywhere.

Maurice Mitchell, head of Encyclopaedia Britannica Films, Inc., spoke Friday morning at the University.

He urged educators to use 20th Century communications in teaching students who are to compete in this 20th Century.

"The growth of educational motion pictures has come at a time when the schools had to rely on outside assistance," Mitchell said pointing to the fact that this growth occurred simultaneously with the "bulge" of child population now passing through the schools.

"World War II experiences, when we simply had to teach large numbers of men new concepts and techniques in the shortest possible time, brought educational films into their own.

"After the war, the educational system began receiving back educators who had learned at first hand the tremendous contribution to learning that teaching films can make," he said.

The result is now that the educational film is frequently accepted on the same plane as the textbook; neither presumes to supplement teacher or parent; each makes a unique contribution to the teaching process, he said.

Mitchell praised the University's facilities in the bureau of audio-visual instruction, saying that Nebraska is in a more favorable position than most of the other states in the country.

His two-day visit to the University was sponsored by the University Summer sessions and bureau of audio-visual instruction.
