Placement:

Frosh Tests Add Writing Section

Freshmen need to know more than grammar rules to impress English examiners this year at the University.

For the first time, placement tests include a section which tests the entering students' ability to write.

Dr. Dudley Bailey, supervisor of freshman English, explained that in previous years freshmen have been placed in one of three courses on the basis of scores on an objective English usage or grammar test.

These three courses are English

3, advanced composition; English B, composition and grammar, and English A, a non-credit remedial course.

Last spring a second section was added to the placement tests. It is an objective test of vocabulary, reading comprehension and linguistic aptitude.

The newest test consists of a series of six questions about such subjects as dating and life in the hometown. The students are asked to write short essay answers to each of the question.

These papers are read by members of the English Department staff who judge each student on his ability to write.

Special emphasis is placed on the writing test as the students are assigned to one of the three English courses.

Thus, a student who cannot write literately and easily is placed in English B although he may have a high enough score on the objective tests to qualify for English 3.

In some instances, the reverse situation occurs. A student may have a score on the objective tests which indicates placement in English B but his writing ability is such that he is placed in English 3.

Dr. Bailey explains that the purpose of the new test is to encourage students to learn to read and write rather than to spend a great deal of time on grammar drills.
