troubled man. Peyroux waits for his laughs and pulls the tears and in all ways fills the bill. The Dauphin, who deserts Joan, is no hero in the play, but Peyroux has planted the seed of might in his character which will grow, so history tells us out of the weeds of confusion to reconquer his lost France.

As the true comic element in the play, James Copp, portraying La/Hire, Joan's captain, is tough, bawdy, delightful.

Deserving special mention, though, is Bill Gnuse, who portrays Robert, the lord of the manor. This part is difficult for it combines the rugged, the simple, the wisened, the regal characteristics in one man and demands that it be played to the hilt. Gnuse does it.

Split Scenes

The play is divided into two acts, or more accurately, two parts. Lown uses a series of flashbacks and split scenes to differentiate between the times and locales significant in Joan's life. And despite the lack of scenery, the viewer condense parking in the center of the campus.

"The best we can hope to do is provide parking on the periphery of the campus and that we are doing."

Pittenger explained that the block located north of Vine St. between 16th and 17th, might be purchased by University and adapted for parking and storage until the land is needed for expansion.

Gold Plated Lots

Fowler said his department is limited by cost of building. "We could make gold-plated parking lots," he commented, if the Board of Regents would authorize such a venture.

"We would encourage permanent surfaces," he said "including lighting and landscaping of the lots."

Other suggestions by students include:

—multi-level parking lots which could not furnish as a self-paying proposition.

—utilization of the area around Love Library and the strip running north from the temporaries to the Carillon tower as permanent parking.

—restriction of parking of a single class, such as not allowing the freshmen to park on campus or else compelling them to use special lots on the edge.
