

Your University—What It Has To Offer

Student Housing Adequate for Larger Demand

An increase in enrollment of about 300 is expected this fall, but it will probably not affect student housing.

The Registrar's office reports that as of July 10, 1,535 applications had been processed as opposed to 1,204 for the corresponding period last year.

Of this increase there are 118 more female applicants and 213 more male applicants than at the same time last year.

University housing accommodations, however, have not been filled to capacity since the addition of Piper, Fedde and Burr Halls in 1957, so this year's increase will not present a problem.

According to Director of University Services, W. C. Harper, women's dormitories last year were short of capacity by 36 residents.

The disuse of Wilson Hall at 1610 R St. which accommodated 10 female graduate students will not affect this fall's housing situation Harper said. The property is expected to eventually be used for a new Methodist Student House.

"We expect to fill women's housing up fairly near capacity this year," Harper said.

None of the cooperative houses or dormitories for men have been filled to date. Should there be an over-flow of male housing applicants, single students who have spent a year in some type of group housing may live in University-approved off-campus housing.

Apartments are available for married students. Van Westover, assistant to the Dean of Men, said that accommodations for married students have "worked out beautifully."

The three housing units completed in 1957 were Piper Hall which accommodates 160 women, Fedde Hall which accommodates 70 women and Burr Hall which houses 230 men.

Housing officials emphasized that enrollment figures represent only applications as of July 10. They anticipate an increased fall enrollment, but final figures will not be available until later.

Piper Hall, on the city campus, is one of the newest additions to University housing.

Psych. Clinic Offers Help To Anyone

Juvenile delinquents and people with personality disorders, academic or social problems are some of the persons helped by the University of Nebraska's Psychological Clinic.

Professor Marshall Jones, head of the clinic, located in the Social Sciences building, noted that their services are open to anyone.

"Doctors from Lincoln and throughout the state often refer cases to us," he stated.

"Less than one percent of the people we deal with are students here at the University," Jones said.

"We have a wide range of services," he noted. "Adults suffering from brain damage or emotional disorders and mentally retarded persons are helped by the clinic."

"We work closely with juvenile probation offices and the court," Jones pointed out, "and often deal with parents that are having difficulty with their children."

"Because we have no two cases that are exactly alike, it is difficult to tell how much good is actually being done."

"It is our opinion at the clinic however, that our services have helped a lot of people a great deal," he added.
