Cheating Taken For Granted?

As a part of the student culture, cheating is being taken for granted, according to an article written by Prof. Jerome Ellison in the Jan. 9 issue of Saturday Evening Post.

Even more dangerous than overt cheating is the frame of mind behind it which Ellison describes as "anti-education" and pursuit of activities.

Mixed Situations
Ellison started with ideas in a book by Prof. Philip E. Jacob of the University of Pennsylvania, "Changing Views in College," which uncovered research of mixed situations.

"Though cheating is widespread, it isn't universal," he said. There is no nationally enforced academic standard to prevent it even though nobody exactly approves.

The editorial writer also said that in two classrooms where cheating was prevalent that the professor simply ignored it.

"K-State has an honor code which outlines standards for students but," the writer observed, "it is obviously worthless unless it is enforced, and only the faculty can enforce it."

Many Devices
Ellison in his report listed what he termed "an ingenious assortment of cribbing and signaling devices in everyday use. Both the "solitary operator" and "gang cheating" were described.

Group efforts include elaborate code systems extending from field glasses to identical twins, the smarter of the two taking the examinations.

He said that students took information on everything from chewing gum to dress hems.

Profs Blamed
The article also said that professors are blamed for lack of supervision in examinations, absence of intellectual stimulation and repetition of the same tests. Administrative officials also came in for blame in that they often failed to punish when cheating was reported.

Theologian's Life Forms Play Plot

The life of a German theologian, murdered by Hitler in a Nazi prison during World War II, forms the background for one of the two one-act plays to be presented in Temple Building Friday and Saturday nights.

The play, "Day of Storms," is an original by Wilma Wolfe, graduate student in the speech department who did her undergraduate work at Nebraska Wesleyan, whose interest lies in religious drama.

The story concerns Dr. Dietrich Bonhoeffer, who believed that "When men are called to Christ, they are called to die." The play shows how he lived this philosophy.

Curtain time is 8 p.m. both nights. After the performance a discussion of the play will follow.
