

New Major To Make Ag Debut

Food Processing Approved in August

Food processing and technology will be a new major offered for the first time this semester to Ag College students.

University officials gave final approval of the new major in August, but due to the late approval, the major could not be catalogued.

R. Burt Maxcy will be the chairman of the new course of instruction and will be assisted by a staff who will represent many of the other departments on the Ag campus. Each member of the staff will be associated with their particular phase of food technology according to their department.

The fact that Nebraska is a large food processing state and that the technology involves both urban and rural areas led to the approval of the new major.

Both men and women may declare the new major.

Various phases in the course of instruction will include freezing, curing, drying and pre-cooking.

Union Names Staff Member

Manager of Student Union food services Allen F. Krause will be a new face in Union offices this year.

Krause, a graduate of the Michigan State Hotel and Restaurant Management School, replaced Martin C. Kohlligian, who is now manager of housing and food services at the Nebraska Center for Continuing Education.

Krause, originally from Denver, Colo., was formerly employed by the Ferris Institute in Big Rapids, Mich., as a food manager.

Although he disclosed no new "specialties" Krause did say that he has available personal recipes to fit almost any event or need.
