

NU Campus Increases Paved Parking Facilities

METERS MEAN MONEY

Grad student William T. White seems a bit confused as he happens upon a new addition to the newly-paved north parking lot. However, White's perplexity can be solved if he has a handy roll of dimes or better yet, if he does not even drive a car.

Rows of parking meters on a freshly paved parking area are awaiting the driving students Monday morning in the Selleck Quadrangle parking lot.

The recent improvements mark the last step in a plan to wipe out the old unpaved area which had been an eyesore and hazard to both drivers and University officials.

The Selleck lot is now an open lot to all drivers on the meter side, according to James Pittenger, assistant to the chancellor.

In the process of the re-surfacing, the area lost some 198 parking stalls but also enabled the removal of the mudholes and the tree stump protruding out of the ground near the center of the north lot.

The meters are similar to those in the Student Union parking area with the same charge of five cents per hour. The money taken from the meters will be used to complete improvements in other areas for campus parking, according to Pittenger.

The improvements have enabled the lot to be beautified around the edges with trees, shrubs and grass.

Biz Ad Gives Scholarships To Twelve

Twelve students enrolled in the College of Business Administration have been awarded scholarships valued at $3,620 for the coming school year, according to Dr. Harry M. Trebing, chairman of the College's committee on scholarships and awards.

Cuban-Born Spanish Professor Says Discontent May End Castro Regime

Dr. Robert Esquenazi, the University's new associate professor of Spanish and a Cuban-born citizen, believes that individual discontent stimulated by religion and education will topple the Castro regime, if it does topple.

Having visited recently with many Cuban professors who left the University of Havana, Dr. Esquenazi said that institution is now very understaffed and that academically it has fallen apart.

"Many professors of literature, philosophy, and history, in particular, have left, and in such haste, they have left personal libraries behind," the former Columbia University professor said. "I know of one case where a professor left 20,000 volumes."

Individual Reactions
Dr. Esquenazi said the religious influence of Protestantism and Catholicism is not making it easy for Castro, with small demonstrations on the increase. "I think it will be the individual reaction rather than group discontent, however, that will cause the most trouble," he emphasized.

"The pattern they (the University professors from Havana) tell you about is familiar. The professor may leave the country with about four pesos, less than 50 cents, or he may stay. If he stays, he will be told what to emphasize in his classes; what books, what great men. If he stays and refuses, he will go to jail. It is that simple."

Dr. Esquenazi, referring to Nebraska and the Midwest, said he visited the state several years ago and now finds that it has advanced economically and culturally. "I didn't understand then how it could be called culturally backward, and I find it even less true now," he said. "It's good to be a part of the Midwest."

A former journalist who served Life magazine as an adviser for its Spanish language editions, Dr. Esquenazi will teach Spanish American literature at the University in the romance language department.
